

THE

A G E

OF

LEWIS XIV.

Translated from the FRENCH of

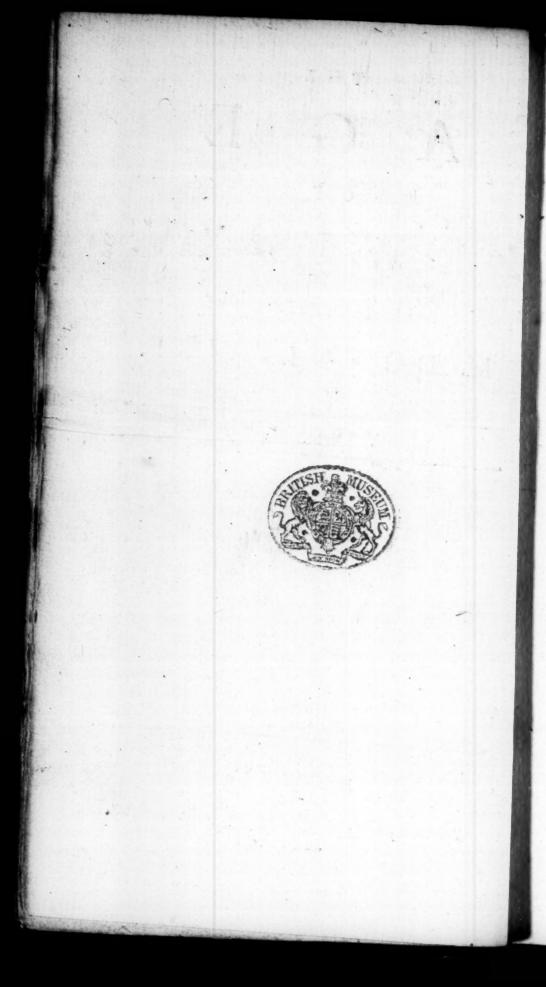

M. DE VOLTAIRE.

VOI. L

DUBLIN:

Printed by George FAULENER, in Effex-Street

THE

Editor's PREFACE.

THE manuscript of this Work having been put into my hands by the Author, I read it with very great attention: I observed in it an extreme love of truth, and a perfect impartiality in regard to all the affairs related in it. These, principally, were the reasons which made me consider it as my duty to print it, under the auspicious protection of a monarch, to whom truth is not less dear than glory; and who, with the general consent of all Europe, is equally capable to instruct mankind, and to judge of their works.

A 2 I thought

I thought such an edition as this would be preferable to one larger, and more pompous: and I dare affirm, that these two Volumes contain more interesting sacts, and curious anecdotes, than are in any of the immense collections which have hitherto been published upon the reign of Lewis XIV.

And though the conclusion of this work contains such things as have been done by Lewis XV. and though more than one shabilitiment of Lewis XIV. has been perfected by his successor, it appeared, nevertheless, that the title of The Age of Lewis XIV. should still continue; not only because it is the history of about eighty years, but, because most of the great changes related in it, were begun under this reign.

13 JY 63

Lang. VII, The conquest of Flanders. Page 1

is d ıt

,

d

S n

e

t

f

1

CONTENTS of the CHAPTERS in the FIRST VOLUME.

CHAPLE, The or demonstrate HAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION.	Page 1
CHAP. II. The minority of Lew	vis XIV. The victories of the French under the	great Condé, then duke d'Enguien. 37

CHAP. III. The civil war. 47

CHAP IV. Continuation of the civil war, to the end of the rebellion in 1654. 59

CHAP. V. The State of France to the death of cardinal Mazarin, in 1661. 71

CHAP. VI. Lewis XIV. governs alone: he forces the Spanish-Austrian branch to give him the precedence in all places; and the court of Rome to make him satisfaction : he buys Dunkirk : he affifts the Emperor, Portugal, the States-general; and renders his kindom flourishing and formidable. 97

Vol. I. b CHAP. VII.

Page I

vi CONTENTS OF VOL. I.

CHAP.	VII.	The conquest of	Flanders.	Page 10
		. The conquest dix-la-Chapelle.		Comté: th
		The magnificent Holland.	nce of Lewi	XIV. th
		The evacuation uest of Franche-		and the se
		The fine camp le Turenne.	aign, and	death of th
		From the deat, en, in 1678.	h of Turenne	to the pead bon	nbardin pope	I. The taking ng of Algiers: humbled: the	the embally	from Sian f Cologn d
		V. King James iam III. and p
W	illiam	. What passed took possession of to 1697.
F	ance,	VI. The peace and Europe: th II. king of Spo	e death, an	: the state d last will,

CHAP. XVII

CONTENTS OF VOL. II. vii

CHAP. XVII. The war of 1701. The conduct of prince Eugene, marshal Villeroi, the duke de Vendome, the duke of Marlborough, and the marshal de Villars, to 1703. Page 251

IO

th

II

. th

1 2

e se

14

F th

15

pe ad

d th

iam n di

17 n-in XIV

19

whil

20

ill,

22

VI

- CHAP. XVIII. The loss of the battle of Blenheim, or Hochstet, and its consequences. 269
- CHAP. XIX. Losses in Spain: the loss of the battles of Ramillies and Turin; and their consequences.

 279
- CHAP. XX. Continuation of the difgraces of France and Spain: the humiliation, constancy, and resources of Lewis XIV. The battle of Malplaquet.
 - CHAP. XXI. Lewis XIV. continues to ask peace, and to defend himself: the Duke of Vendome places the king of Spain upon his throne.

 313
 - CHAP. XXII. The victory of marshal Villars at Denain: the re-establishment of affairs: the general peace.
 - CHAP. XXIII. A view of Europe from the peace of Utrecht to 1750.

VOLUME II.

- CHAP. XXIV. Particulars and anecdotes of the reign of Lewis XIV. Page 1
- CHAP. XXV. Continuation of the anecdotes. 34

CHAP. XXVI.

viii CONTENTS OF YOL. ID

CHAP. XXVI. Conclusion of the anecdotes.	Page 56
CHAP. XXVII. Interior government, con police, laws, military discipline, and mar	nmerce,
CHAP. XXVIII. Finances.	.1 A44
CHAP. XXIX. Arts and sciences.	125
CHAP. XXX. Continuation of the arts.	153
CHAP. XXXI. Ecclesiastical affairs. Me disputes.	morable
CHAP. XXXII. Of Calvinism.	176
CHAP. XXXIII. Of Jansenism.	204
CHAP. XXXIV. Of Quietism.	238
CHAP. XXXV. Disputes upon Chinese cere	monies.
13 JY 63	251

THE

56 ce, 88

14

25

53

able 176

204

238 ies.

251

E

THE

A G E

OF

LEWIS XIV.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION.

HE life of Lewis XIV. is not the only object of this work: its defign is greater and more extensive.

We would endeavour to describe posterity, not the actions only of one man, but the genius of the age; that age which was the most enlightened of all others.

Heroes and politicians are the product of lages: all nations have suffered revolutions;

h

b þ

a ∤ d

tions; and all histories are equal to him who reads only to store his memory with facts. But whoever thinks, and, what is ye more uncommon, whoever has a taste, will regard only four ages in the history of the world. These four happy ages are those in wherein the arts have been perfected, and be which, ferving as an epocha of the grandeu of the human understanding, are an example to all posterity.

The first of these ages, to which true glo ry is annexed, is that of Philip and Alexander; or of Pericles, Demosthenes, Aristotle, o Plato, Apelles, Phidias, and Praxiteles in and this honour was confined within the limits of Greece: the rest of the world was barbarous.

The fecond age is that of Cæfar and Au guftus; which is also distinguished by the names of Lucretius, Cicero, Livy, Virgil, J

Horace, Ovid, Varro, Vitruvius, &c.

The third is that which followed the taking of Constantinople by Mahomet II. Then it was that a fingle family of citizens only, were feen in Italy to do what should have been undertaken by the kings of Europe: the Medici drew to Florence the arts. which the Turks banished out of Greece. The glory of Italy now shone with the brightest lustre. All the sciences recovered new life. The Italians honoured them with the

him he name of Vertu, as the Greeks had cha-with acterized them by the name of Wisdom. ye Every thing tended towards perfection: wil Michael-Angelo, Raphael, Titian, Tasso, Athe iosto, flourished. The art of engraving was host invented. Beautiful architecture again apand peared, even more admirable than in Rome, deu when in its most triumphant state; and Go-nple thic barbarity, which in all things had disfigured Europe, was banished from all parts glo of Italy, and a better taste succeeded.

The arts, continuing to be transplanted otle out of Greece into Italy, found themselves eles, in a favourable foil, in which they grew and the improved very fast. France, England, Ger-was many, and Spain, were desirous, in their turns, to taste the sweets of these fruits; Au but they either did not come into these clithe mates at all, or degenerated in them very rgil, suddenly.

with

the

Francis the first, indeed, gave encouragetak- ment to men of learning; but they were only men of learning; but they were learning in the had architects also, and painters, but he had neither Michael-ould Angelo's nor Palladio's. He, in vain, endeavoured to establish schools of painting. The Italian painters, whom he sent for, formed no French scholars under them.

Under the reign of Henry the second, a few enigrams, and some loose tales. ered few epigrams, and fome loofe tales, composed posed the whole of our poetry; and Rabelais was our only fashionable author in prose.

In a word, the Italians alone had every thing, except music, which was not yet formed into a regular Art; and experimental philosophy, which was every-where equally unknown.

Finally, the fourth is that which is called The age of Lewis XIV. and it is, perhaps, of the four, that which approaches the nearest to perfection. Being enriched with the discoveries of the preceding ages, it made a greater progress in some things than the three others together. Indeed, all the arts were never carried to a greater degree of perfection than under the ages of the Medici's, the Augustus's, and the Alexanders: but human reason, in general, was in this brought nearer to perfection. True philofophy was discovered only in this age: and it may with truth be faid, that, from the last years of cardinal Richlieu to the death of Lewis XIV. there happened a general revolution, not only in our government, but in our arts, minds, and manners; which ought to be an eternal epocha of the true glory of our country. And this happy influence was not confined to France, but extended into England, where it excited the emulation which that fenfible and thinking nation then wanted. It carried tafte into Germany,

Germany, and the sciences into Muscovy; it even reanimated the languishing state of Italy; and Europe, in general, owes its politeness to the court of Lewis XIV.

be-

fe.

ery

yet

n-

al-

ed

DS,

arhe

a

he

of

e-

s:

0-

: :

m

e-

n-

;

ne

y

it

0

7,

Before this time, the Italians called all those nations on the other fide the Alps by the name of barbarians; and it must be confessed, that the French, in some degree, merited this reproachful appellation. ancestors, to the romantic gallantry of the Moors, joined the rude barbarity of the Goths: they knew scarce any of the amiable arts; and this proves, that the useful ones were likewise neglected: for when those which are necessary, are once brought to a degree of perfection, the beautiful and the agreeable foon fucceed: and it is not furprifing, that poetry, painting, sculpture, eloquence, and philosophy, were almost intirely unknown to a nation, which, though it had ports upon the Ocean and the Mediterranean, was nevertheless destitute of ships; and which, though luxurious to excess, was possessed only of a few of the most ordinary manufactories.

The Jews, the Genoese, the Venetians, the Portuguese, the Flemings, the Hollanders, and the English, by turns carried on our commerce, of which we knew not the principles. Lewis XIII. at his accession to the crown, had not a single ship; Paris did not contain 400,000 men, and was not ornamented with four tolerable edifices. other towns of the kingdom refembled those which are now on the other fide of the Loire. All the gentry, being cantoned up and down the country, in castles surrounded with moats, oppressed those who cultivated The great roads were almost imthe lands. paffable; the towns were without laws, the state without money, and the government almost constantly destitute of credit among foreign nations.

B' 3 contain.

It must be confessed, that from the declenfion of the family of Charlemagne, France languished more or less under this weakness, because it scarce ever enjoyed the happiness of a good government.

To make a state powerful, the people should either have a liberty founded upon the laws, or the regal authority fhould be established without controul.

In France, the people were flaves till about the time of Philip Augustus; the lords were tyrants till the reign of Lewis XI. and the kings, constantly engaged in maintaining their authority against their vassals, had neither leifure to think about the happiness of their subjects, nor power to make them so.

Lewis XI. did a great deal in favour of the royal authority, but nothing for the happiness and glory of his people.

Francis

orna.

The

hofe

the

d up

nded

ated

im-

the

nent

ong

de-

gne,

this

the

ople

pon

be

oout

ords

and

ning

nei-

s of

lo.

of

the

ncis

Francis I. encouraged commerce, navigaon, letters, and all the arts; but he was so unfortunate to be able to make themake root in France; and they all perished with him.

Henry the great was meditating the neans to free France from those calamities, nd that barbarity in which it had been lunged by thirty years discord; when he was affassinated in his capital, in the midst of the people whose happiness he was conulting, and would probably soon have esceted.

Cardinal Richlieu, being employed in umbling the house of Austria, and the great lords, and in preventing the increase of Calvinism, was too much engaged in hese affairs, to reform the nation; however he at least began this happy work.

Thus, for the space of nine hundred years, our genius has been almost always obscured under a Gothic government, in the midst of divisions and civil wars: we had neither laws nor customs that were fixed: the language changed almost every century, and yet always continued barbarous: the nobles were without discipline, always in a state of idleness or war, and unskilled in every other thing: the ecclesiasticks lived in disorder and ignorance; and the people, being without industry, were poor and miserable.

B 4

And

And this discovers the reason why the French had no share, either in the great discoveries, or the admirable inventions, of other nations: printing, gunpowder, glass, telescopes, the compass, the air-pump, the true system of the universe; these were discoveries none of which were made by They passed their time in tournaments, while the Portuguese and Spaniards were discovering and conquering new regions, both to the east and west of the known world. Charles the fifth had begun to lavish the treasures of Mexico in Europe, before the subjects of Francis the first had discovered the uncultivated country of Canada: but even by the little which the French did in the beginning of the fixteenth century, we may perceive how much they are capable of, when properly directed.

b

E b

t

f

d

V

f

C

1

r

2

In this history it is designed to shew them as they were under Lewis XIV. and may the descendents of this monarch, and those of his people, being equally animated with a happy and glorious emulation, endeavour to furpass their ancestors!

No one must expect to find here the almost endless accounts of wars undertaken in this age. We are obliged to leave to the annallists the care of collecting with accuracy all these little facts, which would only serve to obstruct our view of the principal object.

the

eat

of

ıs,

the

ere

by

na-

rds

gi-

wn

la-

be-

ad

Ca-

he

th ey

em

he

of 1 2

to

al-

in ın-

all

to

et.

It

fome-

It is their business to relate the marches and countermarches of armies, the days when the trenches were opened before towns, when they were taken and retaken by arms, and when they were furrendered and given up by treaties. A thousand circumstances which were interesting to cotemporaries, disappear, and are lost to the eyes of posterity, and only those great events are brought into view, which have determined the fate of empires. Every thing that is done does not merit the being recorded. We shall confine ourselves therefore, in this history, only to what deferves the attention of all ages, to what may describe the genius and manners of men, to what may ferve for instruction, and to enforce the love of virtue, the arts, and our country.

We shall endeavour to shew the state of France, and the other nations of Europe, before the birth of Lewis XIV. after which we shall relate the great, political, and military events in his reign. The interior government of the kingdom, which is of the greatest consequence to the people, shall be treated separately. The private life of Lewis XIV. and the particularities of his court and reign, will make a considerable part. We shall also have other articles for the arts, the sciences, and the progress of the human understanding, in this age. Finally, we shall say fomething concerning the church, which has been so long united with the government which sometimes weakens, and sometime strengthens it; and which, though instituted to teach religion or morality, does but too often give itself up to politics, and a she human passions.

10 INTRODUCTION

Of the States of EUROPE before Lewis XIV.

ime

infti

HE Christian part of Europe (excepting Muscovy) had long been in such a situation, that it might be considered as one great republic, divided into several States, some monarchical, and others mixed; some aristocratical, others popular: but all corresponding with one another: all having the same foundation for their religion, though divided into several sects; and all having the same principles of political and natural law, unknown in the other parts of the world. It is upon these principles, that the European nations never make their prisoners flaves; that they respect the embasfadors of their enemies; that they are agreed touching the pre-eminence and particular rights of certain princes, as the emperor, the kings, and other inferior potentates; and that, more especially, they are unanimous in regard to the wife policy observed in . preferving, as near as possible, an equal balance of power; incessantly employing negotiations, even in the midst of war, and reciprocally maintaining embassadors, or less honourable spies, in their several courts, who may warn all the others of the defigns of any one, give at once the alarm to Europe, and preferve the weaker from those invasions which the stronger are continually meditating.

After the death of Charles the fifth, the balance inclined too much in favour of the house of Austria. This puissant house, towards the end of the year, 1630. was mistress of Spain, Portugal, and the treasures of America; the Low-Countries, the Milanese, the kingdom of Naples, Bohemia, Hungary, and even Germany (if we may be permitted to fay fo) were become her patrimony; and, if all these states had been united under one head of this House, it is probable all Europe would at last have been subjected to it.

Of GERMANY.

THE empire of Germany is the most powerful neighbour of France; it is nearly of the same extent, less rich perhaps in money, but more abounding in a people robust, and patient of labour. The German nation, in a great measure, is governed as France was under the first Capetian kings, who were chiefs, frequently but ill-obeyed by feveral of their great vaffals, and even by some of their lesser At this day, fixty free cities, which are called imperial, about the same number of secular Sovereigns, near forty ecclefiastical princes, either bishops or abbots, nine electors, in which are included three kings, and, finally, the emperor, who is the head of all these potentates, compose this vast Germanic body, which, through the national phlegm, fublists almost with as much order, as there was formerly confusion in the government of France.

Every member of the empire hath his rights, his privileges, and his obligations; and the difficult knowledge of so many laws, which are frequently contested, makes, what they call in Germany, the study of the laws of nations, for which they are so celebrated.

The emperor himself, considered only as emperor, would not be much more powerful, or more rich, than a doge of Venice. Germany, being divided into free cities, and principalities, leaves to the chief of all these states only the pre eminence,

with

with very great honours indeed, but without dominions or money; and, consequently, without power. By the title of emperor he does not possess a single town: the city of Bamberg alone is assigned for his residence, when he has no other. Nevertheless, this dignity, altogether as vain as it is supreme, was become so powerful in the hands of the Austrians, that it was often feared they would convert this republic of princes into an absolute monarchy.

Two parties at that time divided, and at this day do still divide Europe, and more particularly Germany. The first is that of the Catholics, subjected more or less to the pope; the second is that of the enemies of the spiritual and temporal power of the pope, and the catholic prelates. Those of this last party are called by the general name of Protestants, though they are divided into Lutherans, Calvinists, and others, who hate one another almost as much as they hate Rome.

Germany, Saxony, Brandenburg, the Palatinate, part of Bohemia, Hungary, the states of the house of Brunswick, and Wirtemberg, follow the Lutheran religion; which they call Evangelical. All the free imperial cities have embraced this sect, which was considered as more suitable than the catholic religion to people jealous of their liberties.

The Calvinists, being dispersed among the Lutherans, who are the most numerous, make only an inconsiderable body: the Catholics compose the rest of the empire; and having at their head the house of Austria, they were undoubtedly the most powerful.

Not only Germany, but all the Christian states still bled at the wounds which they had received in these religious wars; a rage which is peculiar to Christians, who are ignorant of idolatry, and is the unhappy

exnd-The

. 1.

and for

ates it is

ect-

vho l of ffer lled

vebided

the erin,

vas his ult

the fo

re ng to

118

e, th unhappy consequence of that dogmatical spirit, which has so long been introduced into all parties. There are sew points of controversy which have not been the cause of a civil war; and foreign nations (perhaps our own posterity) will one day be unable to comprehend how it was possible, that our fore-fathers could kill one another for so many years together, and yet, at the same time, be preaching patience.

In 1619, the emperor Matthias dying without children, the Protestant party exerted itself to deprive the house of Austria of the imperial dignity, and prevent it from descending upon any of the Roman communion: but Ferdinand, arch-duke of Gratz, the cousin of Matthias, was nevertheless elected emperor. He was before king of Bohemia and Hungary, by the abdication of Matthias, and by the choice which the people of these two Kingdoms made of him.

This Ferdinand II. continued to perfecute and weaken the Protestant party. He, for some time, beheld himself the most powerful and the most happy monarch in Christendom; not so much by his own merit, as by the fuccess of his two great generals, Walstein and Tilly; for he followed the example of many of the princes of the house of Austria, was a conqueror without being a general, and was happy through the merit of those whom he employed. His power had long menaced both the Proteftants and Catholics with flavery: the alarm was foread even as far as Rome, over which this title of emperor, and king of the Romans, gives chimerical rights, which the least occasion may render but too real. Rome, which, on its fide, antiently pretended to a still more chimerical right over the Empire, at this time united with France against the house of Austria. The money of France, the intrigues trigues of Rome, and the complaints of all the Protestants, at last drew out of the heart of Sweden Gustavus Adolphus, the only king of that time who could pretend to the name of an hero, and the only one who was able to humble the Austrian power.

The arrival of Gustavus in Germany changed the face of Europe. In 1631, he deseated general Tilly in the battle of Leipsick, so celebrated for the new methods of war which this king put in practice, and which are still considered as some of the master-pieces in the military art.

The emperor Ferdinand, in 1632. was on the point of losing Bohemia, Hungary, and the empire; but he was faved by his good fortune: Gustavus Adolphus was killed at the battle of Lutzen, in the midst of his victory; and the death of this single man re-established what this single man could alone have destroyed.

I.

rit.

es.

not

ons

ble

re-

ars

ing

out

de-

lig-

of

uke

less

nia

and

ng-

and

ne.

of

by

ge-

ex-

ria,

vas

y-

ef-

vas

of

cal

out

re-

he

he

n-

ies

The policy of the house of Austria, which had sunk under the arms of Adolphus, found itself superior to every thing else. It detached the most powerful princes of the empire from the alliance with Sweden; and these victorious troops, being abandoned by their allies, and deprived of their king, were deseated at Norlingen; and they were afterwards more successful, yet they were always less to be feared than under Gustavus.

Ferdinand II. dying in this conjuncture of affairs, left all his dominions to his fon Ferdinand III. who inherited his policy, and, like him, carried on the war in his cabinet. He reigned during the minority of Lewis XIV.

Germany was not at that time so flourishing as it is become since: luxury was unknown in it, and the conveniencies of life were yet very rare among the greatest lords. They were not introduced till towards towards the end of 1686. by the French refugees, who fled thither, and established their manufactories. This fertile and populous country was destitute both of commerce and money: the gravity of manners, and the flowness natural to the Germans, deprived them of those pleasures and agreeable arts, which the Italian fagacity had cultivated for fo many years, and which the French industry, from that time, began to bring to perfection. The Germans, rich within themselves, were poor abroad: and this poverty, joined to the difficulty of fuddenly reuniteing so many different people under the same standards, laid them almost, as at this day, under an impossibility of carrying and maintaining a war among their neighbours for any length of time. And it has therefore been almost always in the empire, that the French have made war against the empire. The difference of genius and government renders the French more proper for an attack, and the Germans for a defence.

Of SPAIN.

THE Spaniards, being governed by the eldest branch of the house of Austria, after the death of Charles the fifth, had spread more terror than the Germans. The kings of Spain were incomparably more rich and absolute. The mines of Mexico and Potosi seemed to surnish them wherewith to purchase the liberties of Europe. The project of universal monarchy over the Christian world, which had been formed by Charles the fifth, was immediately adopted by Philip II. who immured in the Escurial, yet, by negotiations, and by war, endeavoured the subjection of Christendom. He invaded Portugal, ravaged France, and menaced England. But being, perhaps, fitter to traffick with slaves at a distance,

. I.

ees.

to-

ute

an-

de-

rts.

my

hat

ns,

his te-

d-

an

a-

ne.

n-

he

nt

nd

ft

of

le

y

d

.

.

d

y

e

han to combat his enemies in person, he added no conquest to the easy invasion of Portugal: he volunarily facrificed fifteen hundred millions, which make near three thousand millions of our preent money, to subject France, and regain Holand: but his treasures only served to enrich the countries he was desirous to subdue.

Philip III. his fon, being still less martial and less wife than his father, had but few of the virtues requisite in a king. Superstition, the vice of feeble minds, obscured his reign, and weakened the Spanish monarchy. His kingdom began to be depopulated by the numerous colonies, which avarice transplanted into the new world; and it was in these circumfrances, that he drove out of his kingdom near eight hundred thousand Moors, though, on the contrary, he ought rather to have invited more to come into it, if it is true that the number of subjects constitutes the wealth and strength of monarchs. Spain, after this, became almost a defert: the lazy pride of the inhabitants suffered the riches of the new world to pass into others hands: the gold of Peru became the property of all the merchants of Europe: and tis in vain that other nations are prohibited entrance into the ports of Spanish America by severe laws; for the factors of France, England, and Italy, load the galleons with their own merchandizes, enjoy the chief profits arifing therefrom, and it may with truth be faid, that Mexico and Peru have been conquered for them.

The Spanish greatness under Philip III. was therefore nothing more than a vast body without life or fubstance, whose reputation was much greater than its strength.

Philip IV. who inherited his father's weakness. lost Portugal by his own negligence, Rousillon by the weakness of his arms, and Catalonia by the abuse

6

abuse of despotism. It was this king to whom the count duke d'Olivares, his favourite and his minister. gave the name of Great, at his accession to the crown, perhaps with design to excite him to deferve that title; of which, however, he was fo unworthy, that, tho' he was a king, no one eve called him great. Such kings cannot long be fuccessful in their wars against France. And if our divisions and mistakes gave them some advantages they loft the fruits of them by their incapacity Belides, they commanded a people, who, by their privileges, assumed a right to serve them ill. The Castilians had the prerogative of not serving in the wars out of their own country; the Arragonians were perpetually disputing their liberty against the royal council; and the Catalans, who confidered their kings as their enemies, did not even permit them to raise forces in their provinces. Thus this fine kingdom had then but very little power abroad, and was miserable at home. The gifts of nature in these happy climates were seconded by no industry. Neither the filks of Valentia, nor the fine cloths of Andalusia and Castille, were manufactured by the hands of Spaniards. Fine linens were a luxury but very little known. The manufactories of Rlanders, the monumental remains of the house of Burgundy, furnished Madrid with every thing they then knew of magnificence. Stuffs of gold and filver were prohibited in this monarchy, as they would have been in an indigent republic that feared being impoverished. In reality, notwithstanding the mines of the new world, Spain was so poor, that the ministry of Philip IV. were reduced to the necessity of coining brass money, on which a value was fet almost as great as upon silver. It became necessary for the master of Mexico and Peru to make false money, to defray the expences of the State :

te: for, if the sage Gourville may be credited, ey dared not to impose personal taxes, because ither the citizens nor the people of the country, they had scarce any effects, could have been ade to pay. Such was the state of Spain; yet, wertheless, being reunited with the empire, it put considerable weight into the balance of Europe.

Of PORTUGAL.

PORTUGAL had just at that time become adependent kingdom. John duke of Braganza, ho passed for a weak prince, had forced this pronce out of the hands of a king weaker than himals: and the Portuguese, through necessity, cultitated that commerce which the Spaniards neglected brough pride. In 1641 they leagued with France and Holland against Spain. This revolution of cortugal was of greater advantage to France than he most signal victories could have been; and the rench ministry which had contributed in nothing this event, did, without difficulty, obtain the greatest advantage that can be gained over an opponent, which is that of beholding him attacked by in irreconcileable enemy.

Portugal shaking off the yoke of Spain, extending its commerce, and increasing its power, naturally brings into one's mind the idea of Holland, which enjoyed the same advantages in a very different manner.

Of HOLLAND.

THIS little state of seven united provinces, barren, unhealthy, and almost overwhelmed by the sea, was, for about half a century, almost the only example upon earth of what may be effected by

the

n. I.

de. un. eve fuc.

r diages,

their The

the ians the

ered rmit this

oad, ture duf-

fine

s of

hey

hey tred ling

or,

due me to the te:

Ch. 1

n.

di

pu W

eir

er

er (cc

en

100

e,

de

air

hi

y ,

a,

en lh

> ep hi

T

u

0

u

the love of liberty, and an indefatigable industry These poor people, far from being numerous much less martial than the worst of the Spanish forces, and who as yet were of no confideration in Europe, resisted the whole force of their maste and tyrant Philip II. eluded the designs of severa princes, who would have fuccoured them with view to their subjection, and laid the foundation of a power, which has fince been feen to balance that of Spain itself. The despair which is inspired by tyranny, armed them at first; liberty raise their courage; the princes of the house of Orange made them excellent foldiers; and no fooner wer they become their masters conquerors, than they established a form of government, which preserves as much as possible, that equality, which is the natural right of mankind.

The mildness of this government, and the toleration of all sects of religion, dangerous perhaps in other states, but necessary here, peopled Holland with vast numbers of foreigners, especially Walloons, whom the inquisition persecuted in their own country, and who from slaves, by this change, became free citizens.

The doctrines of Calvin prevailing in Holland, ferved still more to increase its power. This country, which was then so poor, would not have been able either to support the grandeur of prelates, or to maintain religious orders; neither could a nation, which was in want of Inhabitants, admit those to live among them, who should engage themselves by oath, as far as was in their power, to suffer the human species to perish. They had before them the example of England, which after the ecclesiastics were permitted to enjoy the sweets of marriage, and the hopes of families were no longer buried

d in the celibacy of a cloister, had become more pulous by one-third.

1. 1

ftry

Ous

mif

on i

afte

vera

ith

ion

and

oire

aifed

ang

were

they

ves

na-

ole

os in land

Val.

own

be-

ind,

un

een

r to

on,

to

by

the

em

esi-

rri-

ou-

ied

h. I.

While the Hollanders, sword in hand, established eir new government, they supported it by comerce. They went to the farthest parts of Asia, ere to attack their masters, who then enjoyed the scoveries of the Portuguese; and they took from em those islands where the choicest spices are roduced; which are as real mines as those of Peroduced; which are as real mines as those of Peroduced; and the cultivation of which is as conducive to the health of mankind, as the working of the mines detrimental to it.

The East-India company, established in 1602. ained, in 1620. near three hundred per cent. hich gain increased every year; so that this socity of merchants foon becoming a formidable pow-, they built the city of Batavia in the isle of Jaa, made it the most beautiful in all Asia, and the entre of commerce, wherein reside five thousand hinese, and to which all the nations of the world epair. The company in this city can arm thirty hips of war, of forty guns, and at least 20,000 nen. A common merchant, when governor of his colony, appears here with all the pomp of the reatest king; nor does this Asiatic grandeur corupt the frugal simplicity of the Hollanders of Euope, This commerce, and this frugality, constiute the grandeur of the Seven provinces.

Antwerp, which had so long been in a stourishing state, and which had swallowed up the commerce of Venice, now became a mere desert; and Amsterdam, notwithstanding the inconveniencies of its port, grew, in its turn, the magazine of the world. All Holland was enriched, and rendered beautiful by immense labours. The waters of the seas were confined by double banks. Canals, cut in all the towns, were faced with stone; the streets became

large

large quays, ornamented with fine trees; and barks, laden with merchandizes, were brought to the doors of almost every inhabitant: so that now foreigners are always struck with admiration at this singular mixture, formed by the houses, the tops of the trees, and the streamers of the ships, which at once, and in the same place, exhibit a view of the city, the country, and the sea.

This state, of so new a kind, was, from its soundation, intimately attached to France: they were united by interest; they had the same enemies; and Henry the Great, and Lewis XIII. have been its allies, and its protectors.

Of ENGLAND.

ENGLAND, being much more powerful, af fected the fovereignty of the feas, and pretended to hold the balance between the powers of Europe: but Charles I. who ascended the throne in 1625. was fo far from being able to support the weight of this balance, that he found the preservation of his own crown difficult and precarious. He shewed himself desirous to render his power in England independent of the laws, and to change the religion in Scotland. He was too obstinate to desist from these designs, and too weak to execute them. He was a good husband, a good master, a good father, and an honest man; but he was an ill-advised king; and engaged himself in a civil war, which at last, deprived him of his crown, together with his life, upon a scaffold, by a revolution that was almost unparelleled.

This civil war, which was commenced in the minority of Lewis XIV. prevented England, for a time, from entering into the interests of its neighbours. She lost her weight together with her honour;

10

ia

d te as

1

h

to

n

W e

ir d qis

8

t

and of to

nov

this

s of

the

ounwere

ies:

Deen

af

d to

pe:

t of his

wed in-gion

om He

her, ised

at his

al-

the

r a gh-

ho-

our; her commerce was interrupted, and she was egarded by the other nations of Europe, as buried nder her own ruins, till the time when she, on a adden, became more formidable than ever, under he dominion of Cromwell, who subjected her, by bearing the scriptures in one hand, the sword in the other, and the mask of religion upon his countenance; and who, in his government, effaced the crime of usurpation by the real qualities of a great ting.

Of ROME.

THAT balance which England had long flattered herfelf she maintained between the sovereigns of Europe by her power, the court of Rome attempted to hold by her policy. Italy was divided, as at this day, into feveral fovereignties. What the pope possesses, is considerable enough to render him respected as a prince; but not sufficiently so to make him formidable. The nature of his government does not increase the people of his territories, who besides, have but little money or commerce: his spiritual authority, in which there is always some share of temporal, is despised and rejected among one half of the Christian powers; and if. in the other, he is regarded as a father, yet his children have sometimes reason to oppose him, and frequently do it with fuccefs. The Maxim of France is to regard him as a facred, but enterprising person. whose toe it is necessary to kiss, but whose hands it is fometimes proper to bind. In all the catholic countries, the steps may still be seen which the court of Rome has formerly taken towards univerfal monarchy. All the princes of the Catholic reli gion, at their accession, send embassies of obedience, as they are called, to the pope. Each crown has in Rome Rome a cardinal, who assumes the title of protector. The pope distributes bulls for all bishopricks, and therein expresses himself, as though he conferred these dignities by his own power alone. All the Italian, Spanish, Flemish, and even French bishops are so called, by the divine permission and that of the holy see. There is no kingdom wherein there are not many benefices in his nomination: and he receives the first years revenues of the consistorial benefices, as a tribute.

The religious orders, whose chiefs reside at Rome, are likewise so many immediate subjects to the popes dispersed in every state. Custom, which does every thing, and through which the world is governed by abuses as well as by laws, has not always permitted princes intirely to remedy these abuses, even tho' they concerned the most facred and useful things. To take an oath to any other than one's lawful fovereign, is confidered as high treason among the laity, and yet in a cloister it is an act of religion. The difficulty of knowing how far one ought to obey this foreign fovereign, the easiness of being seduced, the pleasure of shaking off a natural yoke to put on another, which we take voluntarily upon ourselves, the spirit of contention, and the unhappiness of the times, have but too often engaged whole orders of religious in the service of Rome against their country.

u

C

Ö

h

pi

wl

n

m

er

in le

that

The enlightened spirit which has reigned in France for more than a century past, and which is dispersed among all ranks and conditions, has proved the best remedy of this abuse. Good books written upon this subject, are real services done both to the kings and people; and one of the great changes, which by this means has been made in our manners, under Lewis XIV. is the persuasion which all the religious orders begin to entertain, at they are subjects to the king, rather than serints to the pope. Nevertheless, jurisdiction, that sential mark of sovereignty, still continues with the Roman pontiss: and France herself, notwithanding all the liberties of the Gallican church, pernits appeals in ecclesiastical causes to be finally ande to the pope.

If a person would annul his marriage, espouse his pusin or his niece, or be absolved from his vows, is to Rome and not to his bishop, that he must dress himself. Services of this kind are taxed ere, and private persons of all nations purchase disensations at all prices.

I.

con

and

red

the

ops

ere

he

rial

at

to

is

al.

efe

ed

ner gh

is

W

he

off

ke

n.

en of

in

is

ed

t-

to

at 11

n

1,

ıt

These privileges, which are regarded by some ersons as having been obtained by the greatest buses, and, by others, as being the remains of the nost sacred rights, have been constantly maintained y art. Rome preserves its credit with as much olicy, as was ever shewn by the old Roman republic in conquering one half of the known world.

No court ever better understood how to behave ccording to persons and times. The popes are alnost always Italians, perfectly well skilled in afairs, without being blinded by their passions: their ouncil is composed of cardinals, who resemble hem, and who are all animated with the fame pirit. From this council are iffued those orders which extend even to China and America; fo that, n this fense, it presides over the universe; and one may fay of it what a stranger formerly said of the enate of Rome: I have seen a consistory of kings. Most of our writers have, with reason, exclaimed gainst the ambition of this court: but I do not and one who has done fufficient justice to her prudence. I am in doubt wether any other nation Vol. I. could

he O

e

f

t

ha ne

n n

Ne

u

o ne

ne

C

io

y

a

n

ie

r

Gr

e

VC

ю

le Il

ne

could, for so long a course of time, have preserved in Europe so many prerogatives, which have always been opposed and contested. Any other nation would perhaps have lost them, either by in pride or weakness, by its slowness or vivacity: but Rome having almost continually behaved with a proper firmness or compliance, has preserved every thing which there was a possibility of preserving She was rampant under Charles the fifth, terribe to our Henry III. an enemy and a friend by turn to Henry IV. artful towards Lewis XIII. openly opposed to Lewis XIV. at the time when he was most to be feared, and frequently a secret enemy to the emperors, of whom she was more diffident that of the sultans of Turky.

A few rights, many pretentions, policy, and patience, are all that now remain to Rome of that antient power, which, fix centuries before, was forming designs to subject the empire, and all Europe, to the triple crown.

Naples is a testimony which still subsists of that right which the popes formerly with so much art and grandeur assumed, in creating and bestowing kingdoms. But the king of Spain, who is now the possessor of this state, hath lest the court of Rome, only the honour and the danger of having a too powerful vassal.

Of the rest of ITALY.

IN other respects, the pope's territories enjoyed a happy tranquillity; which had been interrupted only by an inconsiderable war between the Barbarini cardinals, nephews of pope Urban VIII. and

Ch. 1.

rve

na.

but

th

very

ing

rible

um

enly

Was

y to

than

pa-

that

Was

Eu-

that

uch

w.

OW

of

g a

ved

ted

ba-

and

the

he duke of Parma; and this was neither bloody or of long duration, but was fuch as might be exected among these modern Romans, whose maners must necessarily be conformable to the nature f their government. Cardinal Barbarini, the uthor of these troubles, marched with indulgences t the head of his little army. The greatest battle hat was fought, was between four or five hundred nen of each party. The fortress of Piegaia, as on as the artillery approached, which confifted nly of two culverins, furrendered at discretion. Vevertheless, more negotiations were necessary to ut an end to these troubles, which scarce deserve to be mentioned in history, than if antient Rome and Carthage had been concerned in them. nentioned here only to shew the genius of modern Rome, which concludes every thing by negotiaion, contrary to antient Rome, which decided all y the fword.

The other provinces of Italy were influenced by arious interests. Venice seared the Turks and the imperor: she with difficulty defended the territories she possessed on the Terra sirma, against the pretensions of Germany, and the invasions of the Grand Seignor. She was now no longer that anient Venice, mistress of the commerce of the world, who an hundred and sifty years before had excited the jealousy of so many kings. The wislom of her government subsisted; but the loss of her immense commerce had almost deprived her of all force; and the city of Venice, by its situation, was incapable of being subdued, and, by its weaktess, unable to make conquests.

The state of Florence, under the government of he Medici's, enjoyed tranquillity and abundance; etters, arts, and politeness, which the Medici's had introduced in Italy, what Athens had been in Greece.

Savoy, torn by a civil war, and by the French and Spanish troops, had at last reunited intirely in favour of France, and contributed in Italy to a diminution of the Austrian power.

The Switzers, as at this day, preserved their liberty, without attempting the oppression of any. They sold their troops to their more rich neighbours. They were themselves poor, ignorant of the sciences, and of all the arts which luxury introduces; but they were wise and happy.

Of the States of the NORTH.

THE northern nations of Europe, Poland Sweden, Denmark, and Muscovy, were, like the other powers, always in a state of jealoufy and so spicion, or at open war with one another. In Poland, as at this day, there were the manners and government of the Goths and Franks, an elective king, a nobility that divided his power, a people in flavery, a weak infantry, a cavalry composed of the nobles, no fortified towns, and scarce any com-This nation was fometimes attacked by the Swedes or Muscovites, and sometimes by the Turks. The Swedes, who, by their constitution, enjoy greater liberty than the Poles, admitting even the peafants into the general affembly of the states, being however, at this time, more subjected to its kings than Poland, were almost always victorious Denmark, which had formerly been formidable to the Swedes, was then no longer fo to any nation As to Muscovy, it could be considered only as a nation of mere barbarians.

Of the TURKS

THE Turks were not what they had been uner the Selims, the Mahomets, and the Solimans: the feraglio was corrupted by luxury and refineients, yet contaminated with cruelty; and the Itans, tho' the most despotic of sovereigns, were he least secure of their thrones, and their lives. Ofmin and Ibrahim had fuffered death by the cord: Iustapha had been twice deposed; and the Turkish mpire, shocked by these revolutions, was also atacked by the Persians; but when they gave it time to take breath, and the Revolutions in the seraglio were subsided, this empire again became formidable o the Christians; for, from the mouth of the Boisthenes, as far as the states of Venice, Muscovy, Hungary, Greece, and the Isles, have by turns been prey to the Turkish arms: and, in the year 1640. hey were indefatigable in the war of Candy, fo faal to the Christians.

Such were the fituation, the forces, and the inerests of the principal European nations, at the death of Lewis XIII.

The state of FRANCE.

FRANCE, having for allies, Sweden, Holland, Savoy, and Portugal; and the other nations, which remained neuter, being also favourably disposed towards her; maintained a war against the empire and Spain, which proved destructive to both parties,

C 3.

and

the rend

ly in a di

eir li any eigh. nt d

ntro

land e the d fu

Poand Ctive

eople ed of om. 1 by the tion. even

ates, o its ous

e to ion

15 2

01

Ch. 1

and fatal to the house of Austria. This war refembled all those which, for so many ages, have been carried on between the Christian princes wherein millions of lives have been sacrificed, an nations laid waste, only to obtain, at last, a few in considerable frontier towns, the possession of which has very rarely proved adequate to the expense of conquest.

The generals of Lewis XIII. had taken Roufillon; and the Catalans had thrown themselves into the arms of France, as the protector of that libert which they defended against their kings: neverthe less these successes did not prevent the enemy from taking Corbie, in 1637. nor from penetrating ever to Pontoise. One half of the inhabitants of Pan had been driven from thence, by their sears; and cardinal de Richelieu, in the midst of his vast projects for humbling the Austrian power, was reduced to make each of the great gates of Paris surnish aman to go to the war, and to repulse the enemy from the walls of the capital.

The French, therefore, had done the Spaniard and Germans a great deal of mischief; but no without fuffering as much themselves.

Manners of the AGE.

SOME illustrious generals were produced by the wars: such as Gustavus Adolphus, Walesteen, the duke of Weymar, Picolomini, John de Wert, the marshal de Guebriant, the princes of Orange, the count d'Hartcourt, and others. Nor was the age less remarkable for ministers of state: the chancel-lor Oxenstiern, the count duke d'Olivares, and, in particular,

T.

r re

hav

ces

an

whid

€e o

oufil

into

berty

rthe

from

ever

Pari

and

pro-

uced

ifh :

emy

iard

na

on them the attention of Europe. There is no indeed, but what has produced men remarkation for their abilities, in war and politics; for unpopily, arms and intrigue feem to be the two profions most natural to mankind; and we are always under a necessity, either to negociate, or fight. It those who are the most successful, are often reded as the greatest; and the public frequently atbutes that to merit, which is the effect only of rod fortune.

Wars were not carried on then in the manner have seen them, under the reign of Lewis XIV. he armies were not so numerous; no general, ce the siege of Metz, by Charles the sifth, had er been at the head of sifty thousand men; and was were attacked and defended with a less numeous train of artillery than is now employed. The t of fortistication was yet in its infancy; harques's and pikes were not laid aside; and the sword, hich is now become, in a manner, unnecessary, as then in great use. Of the antient laws of naons, there still remained that of declaring war by a herald. Lewis XIII. was the last who observed his custom: he sent an herald at arms to Brussels, a 1635. to declare war against Spain.

Nothing was then more common, than to beold priests at the head of armies: the cardinal inant, the cardinal of Savoy, Richelieu, la Valette, nd Sourdis archbishop of Bourdeaux, all had put in the cuirass, and served, personally, in the wars.
The pope, sometimes, menaced these martial priests with excommunication: Urban VIII. being enaged against France, caused cardinal de la Valette to be told, that he would divest him of his dignity, as a cardinal, if he did not quit the military service;

C 4

but,

the the the

the age

l, in

ie

ai

ui

ee:

ea

ei

hi

no

16

V

ve

dl

f

eff

er

a :

tat

Pai

he

he

ei

ar

he

ity

tin

ras

me do

WE

but, being afterwards reconciled to France, he over whelmed him with favours.

The ambassadors also, who are no less minister of peace than the ecclesiastics, made no scruple to serve in the armies of those allied powers, to whom they were sent: Charnacé, envoy from France, in Holland, commanded a regiment there, in 1637, and, even since, the ambassador d'Estrade has been a colonel in their service.

The forces of France did not, in the whole, a mount to more than about eighty thousand effective men. The marine, which, for ages, had been intirely neglected, though somewhat restored under cardinal de Richelieu, was ruined under Mazarin. The real ordinary revenue of Lews XIII. was not more than about forty-five millions; indeed silver was then valued at about twenty-six livres the mark; so that these forty-sive millions amounted to about eighty-five millions of the present money of France. The arbitrary value of the mark of silver, is, at this day, forty-nine livres and a half; which is very exorbitant, and what, consistent with justice and the public good, can never be increased.

Commerce, which is now known to almost all persons and places, was then in very sew hands, and the interior government of the kingdom was intirely neglected: which is a certain proof of a bad administration. Cardinal de Richelieu who was attentive to his own glory, as connected with that of the state, had begun to render France formidable abroad; but without having, as yet, been able to make her very flourishing at home. The great roads were neither repaired nor guarded; but were infested by robbers; and so were the streets of Paris, which were also narrow, ill paved and filled with offensive nastiness. It appears, from the ver.

fren.

e to

non

, in

peen

, a. tive

in-

ider

rin.

not

lver

the

ited

ney

fil-

If;

rith

ed.

all

ds,

vas

Fa

ho

ith

or.

en

he

1;

he

ed

m he he parliamentary register at that time, that the atch of this city amounted to no more than for-r-five men; those too but ill paid, and such as, in uth, did not do their duty.

Ever fince the death of Francis II. France had een continually haraffed, either by factions, or ci-I wars. The yoke had never been borne in a. eaceable and voluntary manner. The nobility ere, in some measure, educated in conspiracies; hich was then the character of the court, as it has nce been to please the sovereign.

This spirit of discord and faction had diffused it-If, from the court, into the most inconsiderable owns, and had engaged all orders in the kingdom: very thing was disputed; because nothing was abplutely fixed, or understood: even the parishes f Paris came to blows with one another; and proessions encountered for the honour of their baners. The canons of Notre Dame, and those of a Sainte Chapelle, were often at variance, and in a tate of absolute hostility; and the parliament of Paris, and the chamber of accounts, quarelled for he precedency, in the church of Notre Dame, on he day when Lewis the XIII. put his kingdom uner the protection of the Virgin Mary.

Almost all orders in the kingdom were in arms; ay, almost every individual breathed nothing but he spirit of rage and duelling. This Gothic barbaity, which had been formerly authorized by the tings themselves, and which was become the chaacter of the nation, contributed as much as the domestic and foreign wars, to depopulate the kingdom: and it will not be faying too much to affirm, that, in the course of twenty years, of which ten were embroiled by wars; more Frenchmen were

C 5

V

f

P

P

n

C

b

C

V

01

t

i

n

V

Ph

t

l

t

ra

V

1

(

1

killed by the hands of one another, than by the

We shall say nothing here concerning the manner in which the arts and sciences were cultivated: this part of the history of our manners will be found in its proper place. We shall only observe, that the French nation was plunged in ignorance, without excepting those who thought themselves wifer that the common people.

Astrologers were consulted, and believed. As the histories of those times, to begin with that of the president de Thou, are full of predictions. The grave and severe duke de Sully seriously related those which were told to Henry IV. This credulity, which is the most infallible mark of ignorance was so common, and in such credit, that, at the birth of Lewis XIV. care was taken to conceal a astrologer near the chamber of his mother, Anne of Austria.

What is related by Vittorio Siri, a well-informed cotemporary writer, will scarce now be believed the says, that Lewis XIII. was, from his infancy firnamed the Just; because he was born under the sign of the Balance.

The same weakness which gave credit to the abfurd chimera, judicial astrology, also occasioned the belief of sorcery and witchcraft; which were made an article of religion; and it became part of the duty of priests to conjure down the devil. Cours of justice, composed of magistrates who ought to have had more sense than the vulgar, were employed in trying persons accused of witchcraft. The memory of cardinal de Richelieu will always be reproached with the death of that samous curate of Loudun, Urban Grandier, who, by a commission from the council, was condemned to be burntage a magis-

hei

thi

d i

th

10u tha

A

t d

The

ate

nce

the 1 at

e d

med :

ncy

the

ab-

1 the

nade

the

ourt

ht to

em.

raft

ways

urate

nilli.

nt as

a magician: who but must conceive indignation against the minister and judges, for having been so weak, as to give credit to the devils of Loudun, and so barbarous as to cause an innocent person to expire in the excruciating torments of fire? Latest posterity must hear with astonishment, that the marshaless d'Ancre was burnt at the Grave, as a sortceres: this unfortunate woman, when questioned by counsellor Courtin, concerning the kind of sorcery she had used, to influence the will of Mary de Medicis, having answered, She had used that power only, which great souls always have over weak minds; this sensible reply served only to precipitate the decree of her death.

In some of the registers in the Chatelet, the proceedings are still to be seen, in a trial, commenced in 1601, concerning a horse, which an industrious master had dressed, nearly in the same manner in which they are now sometimes seen in a fair: the people were for burning both the master and his horse, as sorcerers.

These instances are sufficient, in general, to shew the genius and manners of the age which preceded that of Lewis XIV.

This universal want of the light of true knowledge produced many superstitious practices among the best of the people; which were a dishonour to religion. The Calvinists, confounding the reasonable worship of the Catholics with those abuses which were introduced into it, were thereby more strengthened in their hatred of our church. To our popular superstitions, which are frequently filled with abuses and debaucheries, they opposed a barbarous severity, and savageness of manners, which indeed, is the character of almost all Reformers. Thus the people of France, by this spirit of party, were in a state of universal dissention among themselves, and the kingdom was rendered contemptible: and that spirit of sociableness, for which this nation is now so celebrated, and so amiable, was then absolutely unknown. There were no houses where persons of merit assembled, for the sake of conversation, and mutual information; no academies; no theatres. In short, our manners, laws, arts, society, religion, peace and war, were none of them then, what they have since appeared, in the time which is called the age of Lewis XIV.

were

CHAP.

h. 1

hem. mpti.

was oufes

ke of

cade.

laws, ne of

n the

CHAPTER II.

he minority of Lewis XIV. and the victories gained by the French, under the great Conde, then duke d'Enguien.

THE cardinal de Richelieu, and Lewis XIII. were both dead; the one, though hated, yet dmired, and the other already forgotten. They had left the French, then in a state of great disquiet, filled with aversion for the bare name of minister, and with but very little respect for the throne. Lewis XIII. by his will, appointed a regency; and the monarch, who was but ill obeyed in his life-time, flattered himself with having more respect paid to him after his death: but the first step taken by his widow, Anne of Austria, was, to cause the will of her deceased husband to be annulled, by a decree of the parliament of Paris 2. This body, which had long opposed the court, and which, under Lewis, had scarce preserved the liberty of making remonstrances, annulled the will of its king with the same facility it would have determined the cause of a common citizen. Anne of Austria addressed herfelf to this body, to obtain the regency unlimited; because Mary of Medicis, after the death of Henry IV. had done the fame: and Mary of Medicis had fet this example; because every other way would have been tedious and uncertain; as the parliament, furrounded by her guards, could not refuse to do what she desired; and because a a August 18, 1643.

Ch.

wi Be

w

wl

ftr

W

an

OI

qu

n

th

I

d

t

decree passed in parliament, by the peers, seemed to fecure to her an incontestable right *.

Custom therefore, by which the regency is given to the king's mother, then appeared to the French a law almost as fundamental as that which exclude The parliament of Paris women from the crown. having twice given judgment upon this question; that is to fay, having, of its own accord; by its arrets, given a fanction to this right of the mothers; it, in effect, feemed to have given the regency; considered itself, not without some appearance of reason, as the tutor and guardian of their kings; and each particular counsellor thought himfelf a part of the sovereignty. By the same arret, Gaston, duke of Orleans, had the vain and empty title conferred upon him, of lieutenant general of the kingdom, under the absolute regency of the queen.

Anne of Austria was forced, at first, to continue the war against her brother Philip IV. king of Spain, whom she loved. It is difficult precisely to give the reason, why this war was carried on against him: nothing was required of Spain; not even Navarre, which should have been the patrimony of the kings of France. Both nations had been at war with each other, ever since the year 1635. because it had been the will of cardinal de Richelieu; and it appears probable, that he had caused and continued it, to make himself necessary. He united

with.

^{*} Reincourt; in his history of Lewis XIV. says, the will of Lewis XIII. was confirmed in parliament. In reality, Lewis XIII. had in his will, declared the queen regent, and this was confirmed; but he had limited her authority, which was annulled: and this seems to be what has missed this writer.

med

iven

ench

udes

aris.

on:

its mo-

re

ear-

heir

im.

ret,

pty

of the

iue

of

to inft

ven

of

at

e-

1;

nd

ed

hė

In

en

er

be.

h

Ch. 2. with Sweden against the Emperor; and with duke Bernard de Saxe-Weymar, one of those generals whom the Italians call condottieri; that is, thosewho fell their troops. He also attacked the Austrian-Spanish branch, in those ten provinces, which we, in general, call by the name of Flanders; and he divided with the Hollanders, who are now our allies, this Flanders, which no one ever conquers.

The heat of the war was in Flanders: the Spanish troops quitted the frontiers of Hainault, under the command of an old experienced general, named Don Francisco de Mello. They ravaged the borders of Champagne, attacked Rocroi, and imagined they should soon be able to penetrate as far as the gates of Paris, as they had done eight years before. The death of Lewis XIII. and the weakness of a minority, animated their hopes; and when they faw themselves opposed by an army inferior in numbers, and commanded by a young man not more than 21 years of age, their hopes were changed into certainty.

This unexperienced young man, whom they despised, was Lewis of Bourbon then duke d'Enguien. afterwards known by the name of the great Conde. Most great generals have become such by degrees: but this prince was born a general: the art of war in him appeared to be a natural inftinct; and, in all Europe, there were only he and Tortenson the Swede, who, at twenty years of age, had that na. tural genius, which makes experience unnecessary.

The duke d'Enguien, with the news of the death of Lewis XIII. had received orders not to hazard a battle. The marshal de l'Hopital, who had been given him as a counsellor to advise and direct him, by his circumspection seconded these timid

ir

a

e

d

e

bi

r

to fi

t

mid orders: but the prince regarded neither the marshal nor the court: he communicated his design only to Gassion marshal de camp, who was worthy to be consulted by him; and they forced de l'Hopital to think a battle necessary.

It is remarkable b, that the prince, having regulated every thing on the evening before the engagement, flept so profoundly, that it was necessary to wake him in the morning. The fame thing is faid of Alexander: it is natural for a young man, wearied by the fatigues which a proper disposition for fo important an engagement necessarily required, afterwards to fall into a deep sleep: and it is also as natural, that a genius formed for war, acting without perturbation, should leave both the mind and body sufficient tranquillity for repose. The prince, by his quickness in perceiving at once both the danger and the remedy, and by his activity, free from disorder, which carried him to all places at the very instant when his presence became necessary, in a manner gained the victory himself. It was he who, with the cavalry, attacked that Spanish infantry, till then invincible, which was as strong, and as closely united, as the celebrated antient phalanx, and which opened itself with an agility that phalanx had not, to make way for the discharge of eighteen pieces of cannon, which were placed in the middle of it. The prince furrounded and attacked it three times: and he was scarce victorious, before he endeavoured to put a stop to the slaughter. The Spanish officers threw themselves at his feet, to gain from him an afylum against the fury of the conquering foldiers; and the duke d'Enguien took as great pains for their prefervation, as he had done to conquer them.

h. 2

mar-

only

ly to pital

egu.

en-Tary

g is

nan, tion

red.

alfo

ting

nind

The

oth

ty,

s at

ry,

he

nas

X,

X.

en le

ee

1-

e

n

t

The old count de Fuentes, who commanded this anish infantry, died of his wounds; and Conde, ing told of it, faid, that he would have died like n, if he had not conquered.

The dread which still remained in Europe of the anish arms, was now greatly diminished; and ople began to respect those of France, which, for hundred years before, had not gained fo celeated a battle; for that bloody one of Marignano, puted rather than gained by Francis the first ainst the Switzers, had been the work of the erman black-bands, at least as much as of the rench troops.

The battles also of Pavia and Saint Quintin were pochas fatal to the reputation of France. It was the misfortune of Henry IV. to gain remarkable dvantages only over his own people. Indeed, uner Lewis XIII. the marshal de Guebriant had ome little fuccess: but this was always balanced by roportionable losses. Such grand victories, as hake the foundations of empires, and for ever renain memorable, were obtained in that age only by Gustavus Adolphus.

This battle of Rocroi became an epocha of the glory of France, and of Condé: he knew both how to conquer, and to reap the benefit of his victory. His letters to the court carried his resolution to befiege Thionville, which cardinal de Richelieu had not dared to hazard; and his couriers, at their return, found every thing prepared to put this refolution in execution.

The prince of Condé croffed the enemy's country, deceived the vigilance of general Beck, and at last took Thionville . From thence he hastened to beliege Cirq, of which he also made himself master.

in

re

de

rli

rs

or

S

o

, ac

T

0

h

ho

aı

tl

a

e

n

10

af

p

he

O:

W

He forced the Germans to repass the Rhine, which he also passed after them, with design to reven the defeats, and repair the losses, which the French had fuffered upon these frontiers after the death the marshal de Guebriand. He found Fribou taken, and general Merci under its walls with a army even fuperior to his own. Condé had und him two marshals of France, one of which w Grammont, and the other that Turenne, who ha been made a marshal a few months before, after having fuccessfully served in Piedmont against the Spaniards. It was upon this occasion that he la the foundations of that great reputation which h afterwards obtained. The prince, with these tw generals, attacked the camp of Merci d, who troops were intrenched upon two eminences. The engagement was renewed three times, on three & veral days. It is faid, the duke d'Enguien threv his staff of command into the enemy's trenches and marched fword in hand to regain it, at the head of the regiment of Conti. These bold actions an perhaps necessary to animate troops to such difficult This battle of Fribourg, rather bloody than decifive, was the fecond victory gained by the prince of Condé. Merci decamped four days afterwards, and Philipsbourg and Mayence surrendered which at once gave both the proof and the fruits of his victory.

The duke d'Enguien, after this, returned to Paris, to receive the acclamations of the people, and to demand a recompence at court, leaving his army under the command of the marshal de Turenne. But this general, notwithstanding his abilities, was defeated at Mariendal. Whereupon the prince

⁴ August 31. 1644. April 1645.

Ch.

ven

rend

ath d

bour

h a

und

Wa

o ha

afte

t the laid

tw

hole

Th

e fe.

rew

hes,

nead

are

cult ody

the

er-

ed,

of

2.

nd

ny

1C.

as

CC

in

in flew to the army, resumed the command, to the glory of once more commanding over renne, joined that of effacing the dishonour of deseat. He attacked Merci in the plains of rlingen , and gained a complete victory. The rishal de Grammont was taken by the enemy; general Glen, who commanded under Merci, also taken prisoner, and Merci himself was ong the number of the stain. This general, who is regarded as one of the greatest men of the was interred upon the field of battle; and the lowing inscription was engraved upon his tomb:

1, viator, hersem calcas: Stop, traveller, thou adest upon an hero.

The name of the duke d'Enguien now eclipsed other names. After this he besieged Dunkirk in ht of the Spanish army; and he was the first no brought this place under the dominion of rance g.

These great successes and services, which were ther suspected than recompensed by the court, ade him dreaded by the ministry, as much as by e enemy; he was therefore withdrawn from the neatre of his conquests, and his glory; and was not with a parcel of pitiful ill paid troops, into Calonia h, where he invested Lerida, but was obliged o raise the siege. He was accused, upon this ocasion, in certain books, of a bravado, in having pened the trenches to the music of violins: but hese writers were ignorant, that this was the custom of Spain.

Affairs soon beginning again to put on a bad afpect, the court recalled Condé into Flanders; where the archduke Leopold, the emperor's broher had besieged Lens in Artois: but Condé being

f August 3, 1645. Coctober 7. 1646. 1647.

again

Ch. 2

ea

ou

rds

y f

ofe

or

nt

E

00 nai

ort

lep

one

fre

fou

Por

Spa

nea

pri

per bel

Fre

put

the

and

wa

not

alo

fle

aff

up

m

again at the head of troops, who, under him, has always been victorious, he marched with them directly against the archduke; and this was the third time that he gave battle under the disadvantage of inferior numbers. The whole of the harangue which he made to his soldiers was contained in these words: My friends, remember Rocroi, Fribourg, and Norlingen. This battle of Lens completed his plant.

pleted his glory i.

He himself relieved and supported the marshalde Grammont, who, with the left wing, began to give ground: general Beck he took prisoner; and the archduke, together with the count de Fuensaldagne, with difficulty escaped. The Imperialists and Spaniards, who composed this army, were dissipated, with the loss of upwards of an hundred colours, and thirty eight pieces of cannon; which at that time, was a great number. Five thousand were made prisoners, three thousand were killed, and the rest deferted, so that the archduke remained without an army.

While the prince of Condé*was thus numbering the years of his youth by victories, and while the duke of Orleans, brother to Lewis XIII. was also supporting the reputation of a son of Henry IV and of France, by the taking of Gravelines, Courtray, and Mardyke ; the viscount de Turenne likewise took Laudau, drove the Spaniards out of Treves, and re-established the elector 1.

He also, in conjunction with the Swedes, gained the battles of Lavingen and Sommerhausen; and forced the duke of Bavaria, at the age of near 80

* His Father died in 1646.

August 20. 1648. k July 1644. 1 Nov. 1644

had nem

the

tag gu

Fri

om.

1 de

give gne, pa-

ted.

and

ne,

ori-

de-

an

ing

hile

Was

V

ur-

nne

of

ned

and 80

144

ars,

ears, to quit his dominions m. The count de Harourt also took Balaguier, and defeated the Spanirds. In Italy, they lost Portolongoni; and tweny ships, and twenty gallies of France, which comofed almost the whole of our naval force, as refored by Richelieu, defeated the Spanish fleet up-n the coast of Italy ".

But this was not all: for the French troops also ook Lorrain from duke Charles IV. a prince of a nartial spirit, but inconstant, imprudent, and unortunate; who, at one and the fame time, was deprived of his territories by France, and kept prioner by the Spaniards. The allies of France difressed the Austrian power both in the north and The duke d'Albuquerque, general of the Portuguese gained the battle of Badajox against the Spaniards. Tortenson defeated the Imperialists near Tabor, and gained a complete victory o. The prince of Orange at the head of the Hollanders, penetrated into Brabant P.

The king of Spain, being defeated on all fides, beheld Roufillon and Catalonia in the hands of the French. Naples, having rebelled against him, had put itself under the protection of the duke of Guise. the last branch of that house, so fruitful in illustrious and dangerous princes. The duke of Guise, who was called only a bold adventurer, because he did not fucceed, at least obtained the glory of landing alone in a small bark, in the midst of the Spanish fleet, and of defending Naples, without any other assistance than his own courage.

To behold fo many misfortunes showered down upon the house of Austria, so many victories accumulated by the French, and seconded by the suc-

m 1645. n 1646. o May 1644. P Mar. 1645.

A nd er,

Ch, 2

Inhat nly t fi hop ity

vith

hat hot hot But nin

bope become the s re

> the mai fior

W]

reac

ceffes of their allies, one would be inclined to be lieve, that Vienna and Madrid only waited for the moment when they were to open their gates; at that the emperor and the king of Spain, were a most without dominions. Nevertheless, five year of glory, which had scarce ever been obscured ever by the shadow of misfortune, had gained but very few real advantages; and though there was a greated deal of bloodshed, it produced no revolution. It indeed, any revolution was to be feared, it was not there in France, which, though surrounded by apparent prosperity, was really upon the brink of description.

CHAP.

h. 3.

CHAPTER III.

The Civil War.

NNE of Austria, being absolute regent, had made cardinal Mazarin the master of France, and of herself. He had obtained that power over er, which an artful man will acquire over a woman, born without strength sufficient to govern, yet with constancy enough to persist in her choice.

In some of the memoirs of that time we read, hat the queen reposed her confidence in Mazarin, nly for want of Potier bishop of Beauvais, whom t first she had chosen for her minister. This bihop is characterized as a man that wanted capaity; which indeed is probable, and that he was eemingly employed for some time by the queen, hat the might not thock the nation by an immediate hoice of a second cardinal, who was a foreigner. But we cannot believe that Potier began his short ministry, by declaring to the Hollanders, that if they poped to continue in alliance with France they must ecome catholics. He should, in this case, have made he same declaration to the Swedes. This absurdity s related by almost all historians, because they have read it in the memoirs of the court, and in those of the Frondeurs. These memoirs contain but too many facts, which are either misrepresented by pasion, or founded only upon popular reports. What is weak and puerile, should not be mentioned; and what is abfurd, cannot be believed.

Mazarin

Mazarin at first used his power with moderation far he was an honest man, or the contrary.

It would be necessary to have lived long with: minister to paint his character, to say what was the degree of his courage or his weakness, and how therefore of pretending to fay what Mazarin was we shall only relate what he did. In the beginning of his greatness he as much affected simplicity, a Richelieu had state and grandeur. He was so from having guards, and parading with the point of royalty, that his retinue at first was very model Affability, and even familiarity, were shewn by his upon all those occasions, wherein his predecessor t t had displayed an inflexible pride and haughtines sc The queen was defirous to make her regency be e v loved both by the court and people; and in this

B

ŀ,

u

go ne

rtl

ey

ad

as

y

on

an,

у,

eac

r tl

ctio

ad b

e o

cado

nd t rifin

ted I

ourt.

fing

Th

rent

nay o ur m

han a Vo

Ch. 2

the state and box is dado in al boabal itsidue Taxes became necessary to support the war against Spain and the emperor: some therefore were imposed, very moderate, no doubt, in comparison with those we have fince paid: and yet in fufficient to supply the necessities of the state.

fhe fucceeded. Gaston duke of Orleans, brothe to Lewis XIII. and the prince of Condé, support ed her power, and had no emulation but in ferving

The parliament, having a right to confirm the edicts for these taxes a, strongly opposed the edict of the tariffs, and gained the confidence of the people, by the opposition with which they per-id a jours admin il

plexed the ministry.

At last, the creation of twelve places of master of requests, and the non-payment of about eighty thousand crowns salary to some of the seniors, caused the whole body of the law to rife, and with them all Paris; fo that what in our times would fearce

• 1647

have

WZ

fore

m.

n

the

dict

the

per-

after

hty

ufed

hem

arce

have

ve furnished the story for a novel, was then the Brouffel, counfellor and clerk of the great chamr, a man without the least capacity, and who had other merit, than that of always oppoling the urt, being feized, it caused more affliction among e people, than they ever shewed for the death of good king. The barricadoes of the league were newed; the fire of fedition in an instant burst th into flames, difficult to be extinguished; and ey were stirred up, and their fury increased, by a adjutor, afterwards the cardinal de Retz, who as the first bishop that carried on a civil war, withit the mask of religion. This extraordinary man s drawn his own character in his memoirs, which e written with fuch an air of grandeur, impetuoy of genius, and inequality, as gives us a very rong representation of his conduct. He was a an, who, from the greatest degree of debauchy, and still languishing under its consequences, eached to the people, and made himself adored them. He breathed nothing but the spirit of ction and sedition. At the age of 23 years, he ad been at the head of a conspiracy against the e of Richelieu. He was the author of the barcadoes, precipitated the parliament into cabals, d the people into feditions. What appears furising, is, that the parliament should be so infatuted by him, as to fet up the standard against the burt, even before they had gained the support of fingle prince.

This body had long been regarded in a very diftrent manner by the court and the people: if we hay credit the general voice of the court, and all ur ministers, the parliament of Paris was no more han a court of justice, for the decision of civil

Vol. I. D causes

Ch.

or

bn

s vit

efp

ap

ro

ro

of

whi

ega

her

righ

the

they

righ

calle

mac

whi

gave desi

twe

was

and

parl

was faid

IIX

nobi

take

con

causes between private persons: that this prerog tive depended absolutely upon the will of the king that it had no pre-eminence over the other part ments of the kingdom, except that of feniori and the being composed of more considerable pe Sons: that it was the court of peers, only became the court refided at Paris: that it had no mo right to make remonstrances than the others, not mention that the right itself was only a favor that it had fucceeded those parliaments which an ently reprefented the French nation; but that had nothing left of these antient assemblies mo than the name : and, as an incontestable proof all this, it was faid, that the states general we substituted in place of these national assemblies; a that the parliament of Paris no more refemble those parliaments held by our antient kings, the a conful of Smyrna or Aleppo refembles a conful of antient Rome.

This fingle error in the name was the pretext for the ambitious pretentions of a body of lawyers who, because they had purchased their employ ments, thought to assume the privileges of the conquerors of Gaul, and the lords who held he of the crown. This body had, in all ages, abule that power which is necessarily assumed by a chie tribunal, continually subsisting in a capital. It has dared to publish an arret against Charles VII. and to banish him the kingdom: it had commenced! criminal process against Henry III. it had at a times refifted its fovereign as much as was in its power; and in this minority of Lewis XIV. under the mildest of governments, and the most indulgent of queens, it would have carried on a cirl war against its prince, in imitation of the parliament of England, which at that time kept its king a prisoner og ing ari

orin

P

Cau

mg ot

OU

an

at

mo

of

Wa

an

nble

the

onf

t fo

ers

lov

th

fiet

ouse

chie

had

and

ed a t all

n its

nder

dul-

civil rlia.

king

oner

prisoner, and afterwards beheaded him. Such vere the private sentiments, and the public disourse of the court.

But the citizens of Paris, and all those who beonged to the long robe, considered the parliament s an august court, which had administred justice vith an integrity that deferved to be honoured and espected, which desired nothing so much as the appiness of the state, and which endeavoured to romote this happiness at the hazard of its own property; which confined its ambition to the glory of restraining the ambition of favourites, and which, in all things, endeavoured to shew an equal regard to the rights both of king and people: and, herefore, without examining into the origin of its ights and power, the people, when they beheld them support their cause against ministers whom they detested, attributed to them the most sacred rights, and a power the most incontestable: they called the parliament the father of the state, and made but very little difference between that right which gives the crown to the kings, and that which gave the parliament the power of moderating their defires.

It was impossible to fix upon a just mean between these two extremes; for, in reality, there was no law absolutely obeyed, except that of time and opportunity. Under a severe government the parliament was nothing, but under a weak king it was every thing; and what Monsieur de Guimené said to them, when they complained under Lewis XIII. of being preceded by the deputies from the nobility, might now be applied: Gentlemen you will take a sufficient revenge under a minority.

We shall not here repeat all that has been written concerning these troubles, nor copy books to give

h

c

as

I

h

hd

ga

ges

rin

ict

785 nai

on

ra

or

re

wai

and

him

fort cha

coa felv

ing tag

off

app

arn po

We

ate

W

th

the reader a relation of affairs, which though interesting and important then, are now almost for gotten: but we shall, however, relate what is not cessary to characterize the genius and disposition of the nation at that time; and passing over such things as are common to all civil wars, confine our selves only to what peculiarly distinguishes that called the Fronde.

Two powers, constituted by the nation solely to maintain peace, namely, an archbishop, and a parliament of Paris, having commenced disturbances, the people considered all their violences as justified. The queen could not appear in public, without being insulted; they called her only by the name of Lady Anne; and if any other epithet or title was added, it contained something injurious or unmannerly. They, with violence, reproached her as a crisicing the nation to her friendship for Mazarin; and, what was yet more insupportable, she heard songs and ballads sung in almost all places, designed to perpetuate the suspicion which was universally entertained of her virtue, and to be monuments of the wit and malignity of the times.

She fled from Paris to St. Germains b, accompanied by her children, her minister, the duke of Orleans, brother of Lewis XIII. and the great Condé himself. They were reduced to pawn the jewels of the crown; and the king himself often wanted necessaries. They were forced to dismiss the pages of the queen's chamber, because they were unable to maintain them. Upon this occasion also, even the aunt of Lewis XIV. daughter to Henry the great, and wife to the king of England, having taken refuge in Paris, was there reduced to b Jan. 6. 1649.

h. 3. e extremities of poverty; and her daughter, who as afterwards married to the brother of Lewis IV. lay in bed for want of fire to warm her. he people of Paris, being in a manner possessed nd intoxicated by their rage and fury, paid no gard to the distresses of so many royal person-

ges.

in.

for.

ne.

n of fuc

our. that

y to

par-

ces, ied,

be-

of

Was

an. fa-

in:

ard

ned

en-

of

mike

eat,

the

ten nis

ey

On

to

ıd,

to

he

The queen, with tears in her eyes, begged the rince of Condé to be the king's protector. The ictor of Rocroi, Fribourg, Lens, and Norlingen, vas incapable of any thing not conformable to fo nany past services; and he was flattered with the onour of defending a court, which he thought unrateful against the Fronde, which sought his suport. But the parliament, though it had the reat Condé to oppose, yet dared to pursue the war.

The prince of Conti, brother to the great Condé, and as jealous of him as he was incapable to equal him; the duke de Longueville, the duke de Beaufort, and the duke de Bouillon, being desirous of change; animated also by the factious spirit of the coadjutor; flattered with the hopes of raising themselves upon the ruins of the state, and with makeing the wild proceedings of the parliament advantageous to their own private interests; came and offered their fervices to that body. Generals were appointed in the great chamber to command an army, which they had not. Every individual imposed a tax upon himself to raise troops. There were in the parliament twenty new counsellors created by cardinal de Richelieu, upon whom the rest of their brethren, through a meanness of spirit, of which every fociety is susceptible, seemed to persecute the memory of that minister. They loaded them with affronts, refused to regard them as

D 3

members

h.

he

fte 1

hd

tl

ut

ub]

ftl

v t

Par

Iwa

erf

eld

rea

Fro

carr iusp

thei 7

tool

coc

eve

arch

fynd

mig

me

ral.

was

dan

pro Fre

I fem

Ch. 3 members of the parliament; and made each o them pay 15,000 livres towards defraying the expences of the war, and to purchase the toleration of their brethren.

The great chamber, the inquests, the request the chamber of accounts, the court of aids, which had exclaimed with fuch violence against an inconsiderable and necessary impost, which did no amount to more than an hundred thousand crowns raised the sum of near ten millions of our present money, for the destruction of their country, Twelve thousand men were raised by arret of parter a liament. Every great gate furnished a man and horse; and this cavalry was therefore called the a of p valry of the great gates. The coadjutor had are giment under his own command, which was called not the regiment of Corinth, because the coadjutor was titular archbishop of Corinth.

Had it not been for the names of the king of France, the great Condé, and the capital of the kingdom, this war of the Fronde would have been as ridiculous as that of the Baibarini: no one could fay why they were in arms. The prince of Conde besieged five hundred thousand citizens with eight thousand soldiers. The Parisians quitted the city, and came out into the fields, many of them dreffed up with feathers and ribbands. Their exercises were the jest of the regular troops. Upon the approach of only two hundred of the royal army, they would take to flight. Every thing was turned into ridicule. The regiment of Corinth being defeated by a fmall party, this defeat was called the first epistle to the Corinthians.

Those twenty counsellors, who had each of them furnished fifteen thousand livres, gained no other 2 0 ex-

tio

hid

con-

DO

Vns.

fent try.

par-

and ca-

Was

ould

ndé

ight

ity, Med

cifes

ap-

ny,

um.

eing

the

of

no ther

h. 3. her honour than that of being called the twenty fteens.

The duke of Beaufort was the idol of the people. nd the instrument employed in working them up est this state of sedition: he was a popular prince; ut his capacity was inconfiderable, and he was the ublic object of the raillery of the court; and even f the Fronde itself. He was never mentioned but y the name of king of the city-companies. The Parisian troops, which marched out of Paris, and Iways returned defeated, were received with laugher and derision; and were the occasion of many rerses and epigrams. The taverns, and other places of public entertainment, were the tents where they re peld their councils of war, in the midst of the alle most dissolute mirth. The licentiousness became so great, that one night the principal officers of the Fronde having met the holy facrament, which was carrying through the street to a person, whom they suspected to be Mazarin, they beat the priests with their swords, and forced them to return.

The coadjutor himself, archbishop of Paris, took his feat in parliament, with a poinard in his pocket; the handle of which being perceived, several persons present cried out, See! there is our archbishop's breviary.

In the midst of all this confusion, the nobility assembled in a body, at the Augustines, appointed the fyndics, and had public regular meetings: so that it might have been supposed, their design was to remedy these disorders, and assemble the states general. Nevertheless, the only cause of their meeting was a tabouret, which the queen had granted to madam de Pons. Perhaps there never was fo strong a proof given of that lightness of mind, with which the French are reproached.

The

Ch.

The civil diffensions which reigned in England precifely at the same time, may serve extreme well to shew the characters of the two nations The English, in their civil discords, shewed a me lancholy cruelty, and a fensible madness: the battles were bloody; they decided all things by the fword; scaffolds were erected for the van quished: their king, being taken prisoner, wa brought before a court of justice; questioned concerning the abuse of his power, with which he has been accused; condemned to lose his head; and was executed in presence of all his people, with great order, and the same formality of justice, as it had been the execution of one of his subjects: nor was London, in the course of these horrid disorders, ever in the least sensible of, or affected by, the alamities, which are the confequence of civil wars.

The French, on the contrary, precipitated themfelves into feditions, through wantonness and caprice: women were at the head of factions, and cabals were formed, and disfipated, by love. The dutchess de Longueville engaged Turenne, then just made a marshal of France, to cause the army, which he commanded for the king, to revolt. Turenne did not succeed in this; and quitted that army, of which he was general, like a fugitive, to please a woman, who laughed at his passion. From being a general to the king of France, he became lieutenant to Don Estevan de Gamara, with whom he was defeated at Retel, by the royal troops. Every body has heard of the marshal d'Hoquincourt's letter to the dutchess de Montbazon; Peronne est à la belle des belles : Peronne is subjected to the fairest among the fair. Those verses also are well known, which were written by the duke de la Rochfaucault to the dutchess de Longueville, when,

the et : fig

Por

T

I

T

nt ot f (nd

elf ind lor nto

> VO ne Al

day aid lari and

it. Co do

for be na

1.

land

me

ions me

their van-

W25 con

had

and

vith

as if

nor ers,

ca-

m.

caca-

he

en

ıy,

11

11to

m

ne

m

S.

need re la

1,

n

. 3. the battle of Saint Antony, he received a muset shot, which, for some time, deprived him of fight:

Pour meriter son cœur, pour plaire à ses beaux yeux, T'ai fait la guere aux rois, & l'aurais faite aux Dieux.

To please her bright eyes, gain the heav'n of her love,

I have warr'd against kings, and would war against Jove.

The war was ended and renewed feveral differnt times; and there was scarce any one who did ot change parties more than once. The prince of Condé having successfully defended the court, nd conducted it in triumph into Paris, gave himelf up to the pleasure of despising it; and, not inding that he was rewarded in proportion to his glory and services, he was the first to turn Mazarin nto ridicule, to brave the queen, and infult that government which he disdained. It is said, that te wrote to the cardinal, with this superscription, A l'illustrissime Signor Faquine: and that, being one day in his company, when he took his leave, he aid, Adieu, Mars. He encouraged the marquis de Jarsai to make a declaration of love to the queen, and was disgusted at her daring to be offended at it. He leagued with his brother the prince of Conti, and the duke de Longueville, who abandoned the party of the Fron e. The duke of Beaufort's faction, at the beginning of the regency, had been called that of the Importants: Conde's was named the party of Petits-maitres; because their de-

Ch.

ch.

in;

bve

te

ad

me

art

e i

is (

er,

etir

on

lter

nd

yho

he

Cor

he

Fr

jed

H

G

F

m

ti

n

fire was to become masters of the state. The or memorials now remaining of these troubles, are name of petit-maitre; which, at this day, is appli to our youths of good families, but bad education and the name of Frondeurs, which is applied to censurers of the government.

The coadjutor, who had declared himself an in placable enemy to the minister, secretly reunit with the court, to obtain a cardinal's cap; and crificed the prince of Condé to the resentment Mazarin: and that prince, who had defended the flate against its enemies, and the court against a bels; that Condé, who was at the height of glor having, upon all occasions, behaved like an hen and ever shewn himself a man of great abilities was feized and imprisoned, together with the print of Conti, and the duke de Longueville. He mis have governed the state, if he would have conde fcended to the arts of pleasing; but he rather chol The people of Paris, who had re to be admired. newed their barricadoes, in defence of an old is peranuated counsellor, made the greatest rejoicing when the hero, and the defender of France, wa confined in the castle of Vincennes.

One year after, these very Frondeurs, who has fold the great Condé and the princes, to the timi revenge of Mazarin, forced the queen to open their prisons, and banish her prime minister out of the kingdom: and Condé, on his re-appearance in public, received the acclamations of those very people, whose hatred against him had been in violent: but his presence renewed the cabals and diffentions.

The kingdom continued in this state of disorder and confusion some years longer. The government always purfued measures that were weak and uncertain;

h.

e on

ire t

ppli

tion

to n in unit

nd

ent o

ft n lon

hero ities

rind nigh

nde chok d re I fu

ings

Was

had

heir

the

in

ery

and

der

ent

er.

Ch. 4.

in; and it seemed probable it would, at last, be betted: but the malecontents were in a constant ate of disunion, which preserved the court. The padjutor, who was sometimes a friend, and somemes an enemy, to the prince of Condé, irritated art of the parliament and people against him; had be impudence to make the queen the instrument of is opposition, and, at the same time, to provoke er, by forcing her to banish cardinal Mazarin, who etired to Cologne. The queen, thro' a contradiction too commonin weak governments, was obliged, Iternately, to receive his services, and his offences, and to nominate this very coadjutor for a cardinal, who had compelled the royal family to retire out of the capital, and to besiege it.

CHAPTER IV.

Continuation of the civil war, to the end of the rebellion in 1654.

CONDE' at last resolved to begin a war, which, to have become master of the state, he should have commenced in the time of the Fronde; but which, if he had been a good subject, he would never have commenced at all. He quitted Paris, and went to raise forces in Guienne, Poitou, and Anjou; and to head against France those Spaniards, to whom he had been the most terrible scourge.

Nothing can better shew the disposition of those times, and the absurdity or caprice which determined all affairs, than what now happened to this

an diff the the

1

wa

kin

fift

eve

aliv

gre

pri mi

an aft

nat pro

on an gai

cat

hu

mı

mi

for

on te

Cl

this prince. A courier was fent to him from Paris, with propofals to engage him to peace, an to return. The courier made a mistake, and, in stead of going to Angerville, where the prince was, he went to Augerville. The letter, by this get mistake, arrived too late; and Condé only said that if he had received it sooner, he would have lear accepted the proposals of peace; but that since he ma was now at a great distance from Paris, it was Par not worth his while to return thither. And thus the this mistake of the courier, and the mere capric fcri of the prince, again plunged France into a civil war. wa

Ch. 4

And now cardinal Mazarin, who even in his exile at Cologne had governed the court, re-entered the kingdom, not fo much like a minister who came to resume his post, as like a sovereign who retook possession of his dominions c: he was escorted by a little army of seven thousand men, raised at his own expence, or, rather, at the expence of France; for he had appropriated the public money to his own use.

In a declaration published at that time it was told the king, that Mazarin had actually raised these troops with his own money; which must disprove the opinion of those who have affirmed, that, at his first retirement out of the kingdom, he had beenin a state of indigence. He gave the command of his little army to the marshal d'Hoquincourt. All the officers wore green Scarfs, which was the colour of the cardinal's livery. Each party had, indeed, its scarf. White was the king's: the prince of Conde's was the Isabella colour. It is surprising, that eardinal Mazarin, who till then had affected to much modesty, should have the boldness to make

December 1651.

1. 4

inince this

faid

have

e he

Wa thus

rice

war. xile

the

to

ook

y 2

WI

for

WD

old

ele

SVC

his

in

his

the

of

its

n-

at 6 ke

m

from an army wear his livery, as though he had a party an different from his master's: but he could not resist the vanity of it, in which he was countenanced by the queen. The king, who was now of age, to-gether with his brother, went to meet the cardinal.

Upon the first advice of his return, Gaston d'Orleans, the brother of Lewis XIII. who had demanded the banishment of Mazarin, raised troops in Paris, without well knowing wherein to employ them. The parliament renewed its arrets, proscribed Mazarin, and set a price upon his head. It was necessary to search the registers, to find what was the price fet upon the head of an enemy to the kingdom. It appeared, that, under Charles IX. fifty thousand crowns had been promised to whoever should bring admiral Coligny either dead or alive; and it was thought proper to proceed with great seriousness and regularity, in putting the same price upon the affaffination of the cardinal prime minister. But this proscription tempted no one to an acquisition of the fifty thousand crowns, which, after all, would not have been paid. In any other nation, and at any other time, fuch an arret would probably have been executed; but this became only the subject of new pleasantries. The Blots and the Marignys, wits of that time, who diffused gaiety and mirth into these tumults and troubles, caused papers to be fixed up in Paris, promising an hundred and fifty thousand livres, to be divided; so much to whoever should slit the cardinal's nose; so much for an ear; so much for an eye; and so much for making him an eunuch. 'This ridicule was the only effect of the profcription. Nor did the cardinal, on his fide, employ either poison or affassination against his enemies; and not with standing the inveteracy and violence of to many different parties and opinions

he

erv

art

en

wh

ak

ha

be

the

T

be

th

le

th

ar

tv

ol

17

C

i

a

(

opinions, many great crimes were not committed. The chiefs of the parties were not cruel, nor the people furious; for this was not a religious war.

That infatuation, which was so universal at this time, so intirely possessed the whole body of the parliament of Paris, that, after having solemnly decreed an assassination, which was laughed at, it issue an arret, by which several counsellors were to transport themselves upon the frontiers, to oppose the army of cardinal Mazarin; that is, the royal army.

Two counsellors were so imprudent as to go with some peasants to break down the bridges over which the cardinal was to pass; and were made prisoners by the king's troops; but they were presently released, and became the jest and ridicule of all parties.

At the same time when the parliament proceeded to these extremities against the king's minister, it declared the prince of Condé, who had taken arms only against this minister, guilty of high-treason; and, thro' a contradiction which all the former proceedings render credible, it ordered the new-raised troops of Gaston duke of Orleans to march against Mazarin; and, at the same time prohibited the taking of any moneys out of the public treasury to pay them.

Indeed, nothing better could be expected from a company of magistrates, who thus acted out of their sphere, not knowing either their rights, or their real power; unskilled both in politics and war; alsembling and deciding in tumult; and siding with parties which the day before they had no thought of, and at which they were themselves afterwards astonished.

h. 4

itted

r the

r.

the

de

Tued

rans.

Oya

o go

Over

nade were

cule

eded

r, it

on;

oro-

ufed

inft

the

y to

m a:

of

heir

al-

vith

ght

rds

The

The parliament of Bordeaux was at this time at he devotion of the prince of Condè; but it oberved a more uniform conduct; for, being much arther from court, it was less agitated by contending parties.

But more considerable objects now interested the whole kingdom of France.

Condè being leagued with the Spaniards, had taken the field against the king; and Turenne, having quitted those Spaniards with whom he had been deseated at Retel, had made his peace with the court, and again commanded the royal army. The exhausted condition of the sinances did not permit either party to have numerous forces: but the sate of the kingdom was as much decided by lesser numbers. There are times when an hundred thousand men are scarce able to take two towns: and there are others, wherein an engagement between seven or eight thousand will be sufficient to obtain or preserve a crown.

Lewis XIV. who was educated in adversity, went, together with his mother, his brother, and cardinal Mazarin, from province to province, having scarce so many troops about his person, as he afterwards had in times of peace for his ordinary guard: and five or six thousand men, part of them sent from Spain, and the rest raised by the partizans of the prince of Condé, pursued him into the heart.

of his kingdom.

The prince of Condé, in the mean time, marched from Bordèaux to Montauban, took many towns, and every-where increased his party.

All the hopes of the court were centred in the marshal de Turenne. The royal army was encamped near Gien, upon the river Loire. That of the prince of Condé was at some leagues

at

or

rea

ru

VE

nac

00

m

in

cca

ou

epi

rue

rat

ille

ear

nily

ina

ent

idei

rise

cauf

njo

line

all T

heir

pres

der

ion

was

ens

con whi

C

distance under the command of the duke de Nemours, and the duke of Beaufort. The animofity fublifting between these two generals, was very near being fatal to the prince's party. The duke of Beaufort was incapable of the least command: and the duke de Nemours was rather esteemed for his amiableness and bravery, than for his abilities. They well nigh proved, between them, the ruin of their army. The foldiers knew that the great Condè was at an hundred leagues diftance, and had already confidered themselves as in a state of de-Aruction; when, at the dead of night, a courier appeared in the forest of Orleans before the advanced guards. The centinels prefently discovered, that this courier was no other than the prince of Condé himfelf, who, through a thousand dangers and adventures, had come in disguise from Agen, to put himself at the head of his army.

His presence alone did a great deal, and this unexpected arrival much more. He knew, that whatever is sudden and unhoped for, animates and transports mankind; and he therefore instantly took advantage of that courage and confidence which he had inspired. The great talent of this prince in war consisted in forming the boldest resolutions in an instant, and in executing them with equal prudence and celerity.

The royal army was separated into two bodies. Condè de fell upon that which was at Blenau, commanded by the marshal d'Hoquincourt; and this body was dispersed almost as soon as attacked. Turenne could not be informed of it; and Mazarin ran in a fright, and in the middle of the night, to Gien, to wake the king, who was assep, and tell him what had happened. The news threw his little d April 1652.

Ne.

no-

ery

uke

ad:

for

ies,

1 of

reat had

de-

rier

ad-

ed,

of

ers

en,

n-

at-

nd

ly

ce

his

0-

th

S.

1-

is

d.

in 0 ell.

le

rt

th. 4. ourt into the greatest consternation; and it was at aft proposed to save the king by slight, and priately conduct him to Bourges. The victorious ondé drew near to Gien; and his approach inreased the dread and despair of the court : but Turenne encouraged them by his firmness, and ved them by the prudence of his conduct: for he hade so good a disposition of his little remains of roops, and took his advantage of the situation and me so happily, that he prevented Conde from puring his advantage. It was difficult, upon this ccasion, to decide which gained the greatest hoour: Condé, in being victorious, or Turenne, in epriving him of the fruits of his victory. It is rue, that, in this battle of Blenau, fo long celerated in France, there were not four hundred men illed; but the prince of Condé was not the less lear making himself master of the whole royal family, and of getting into his power his enemy cardinal Mazarin. Greater interests, or a more immient danger, could scarce ever depend on so inconiderable an engagement.

Condé who did not flatter himself he should surprise Turenne, as he had surprised Hoquincourt, aused his army to march towards Paris, there to enjoy his glory in the favourable dispositions of a lind people. Their admiration of this last battle, Il the circumstances of which were exaggerated, heir hatred against Mazarin, and the name and presence of the great Condé, seemed at first to render him absolute master of the capital. But diviion reigned in the minds of all; and each party was subdivided into factions, which generally happens in all troubles. The coadjutor, who was now become cardinal de Retz, being in appearance reconciled to the court, which feared him, and in which he did not confide, was no longer the master

rty

ine

he

om

alac

ne

d t

ny

qua

rine

on

erf

hed

fpo

dare

0 1

dire

be

all t

by 1

the

kne

upo

buf

but

rag

ful

wh

me

Wi

of the people, nor the principal leader among them. He governed the duke of Orleans, and opposed Condé. The parliament fluctuated between the court, the duke of Orleans, and the prince, but all were unanimous in exclaiming against Mazarin: every one secretly pursued his private interests: the people was a tempestuous sea, the waves of which were tossed about by many contrary winds. The shrine of St. Genevieve was carried through Paris in procession, to obtain the expulsion of the cardinal minister; and the populate made no doubt the saint would work this mirade, as well as grant rain.

Nothing was feen but negotiations between the chiefs of the parties, deputations from the parliament, affemblies of the chambers, seditions among the people, and the whole country in arms. kept guard before the gates of monasteries. prince had called in the Spaniards to his affiftance Charles IV. that duke of Lorrain, who was driven out of his dominions, and whose sole remainder of power or fortune was an army of eight thousand men, which he fold annually to the king of Spain, came to Paris with this army. Cardinal Mazarin offered him more money to return than the prince of Condé had given him to come; and therefore the duke of Lorrain foon retired out of France, having laid it waste in his passage, and carried away with him the money of both parties.

Condé now remained in Paris with a power which diminished daily, and an army yet more weak. Turrenne conducted the king and his court towards the capital; and the king, from the summit of Charonne, beheld the battle of St. Antony, wherein these two generals, with so little armies, performed so great things, that both their reputations which already ready appeared too great to be increased, were t more exalted by them.

The prince of Condé, with a few lords of his rty, followed by a fmall body of foldiers, fufined, and repulsed the attack of the royal army. he king and Mazarin beheld this engagement om an eminence. The duke of Orleans, being pubtful what party to embrace, remained in his alace of Luxembourg. Cardinal de Retz was canned in his archbishoprick. The parliament waitd the event of the battle, before they published ny decree. The people, who, upon this occasion, qually feared the troops both of the king and rince, had closed the city-gates, and would suffer one either to enter or go out; while the greatest personages in France were engaged in battle, and hedding their blood in the suburbs.

At last Mademoiselle e, the daughter of Gaston, spoused the party of Condé, whom her father dared not to assist; caused the gates to be opened to receive the wounded, and had the boldness to direct the cannon of the Bastille to be fired upon the king's troops. The royal army retired; and all that Condé gained was glory: but Mademoiselle, by this violent action, for ever ruined herself with the king her cousin; and Cardinal Mazarin, who knew her extreme desire to espouse a crowned head, upon this occasion, said, Those cannon have killed her busband.

. 4.

2000

Op.

Veen

ice!

Ma.

in-

the

itra-

ani.

pul.

lace

cle

the

rlia.

ong hey

Γhe

ice.

ven

r of

and

ain,

arin

nee

ore

ce,

ay

ich

ak.

rds.

of

ein

red

ich dy Most of our historians give their reader snothing but relations of battles, and the prodigies of courage and policy: but whoever knows what shameful resources were used upon this occasion, into what misery the people were plunged, and to what meannesses the chiefs of both parties were reduced will regard the heroes of that time rather with pity

s

ant

si

d

as

ho

ou

d t

an

h

ini

eti

C

ad

t tra

ont

T

al.

app

gin bee

tur

to

Was

than admiration. We may be enabled to judge of this from what is related by Gourville, who wa attached to the prince. He confesses, that to ob. tain money, he did himself secrete a sum for which he had given a receipt; and that he feized a certain post-master in his lodgings, and made him pay ransom for his liberty; and these violences, head fures us, were very common.

After the bloody, tho' not decisive, battle of & Antony, the king was unable to re-enter Paris: and the prince could not continue in it long. popular tumult, joined to the murder of sever citizens, of which he was believed to be the author, rendered him odious to the people. Nevertheless he had his party in the parliament. This body, being then but little intimidated by a court which wandered about, and was in a manner driven out of its capital, and which was diffressed by the carbon bals of the duke of Orleans, and the prince, by a the arret f, declared the duke of Orleans lieutenant-ge-int neral of the kingdom, tho' the king was of age, is The fame title had been given to the duke de May. noth enne in the time of the League. The prince of KIV Condé was stiled generalissimo of the armies. The the court, in a rage ordered the parliament to be transform ferred to Pontoise; which only some of the coun-fellors obeyed: so that now there were two parlia-ments, who disputed each other's Authority, and is-suited contradictory arrets; by which they would have rendered themselves contemptible to the people, had not they always continued unanimous in demanding the expulsion of Mazarin: so much did a hatred against this minister then appear to be an effential duty in a Frenchman.

There were none of the parties at this time, but what were in a weak condition: that of the court ge of

Wa ob-

hid

rtain

ay: e af

in

Was

as as weak as any of them; they were all in ant both of men and money; tumults and factis increased; and engagements between the parties d only produced losses and vexation. The court as again forced to facrifice Mazarins, whom the hole nation accused as the cause of the troubles, ough he was really only the pretence. He quitd the kingdom a fecond time, and, to increase the ame of it, the king published a declaration, wherehe acknowledged, that the parted with his inister, he was pleased with his services, and retted his exile.

Charles the first, king of England, had lost his ead upon a scaffold, for having, at the beginning ody, i the troubles, sacrificed the blood of his friend trafford to his parliament. Lewis XIV. on the out ontrary, became the peaceable master of his kingca. com, by fuffering the exile of Mazarin. And thus ya he same weakness were the causes of very differge at effects. The king of England, by abandoning age is favourite, emboldened a people, who breathed othing but war, and who hated kings: but Lewis of KIV. (or rather the queen-mother) by banishing the cardinal, took away all pretence for sedision from a people that were weary of war, and who were lovers of regal dominion.

The cardinal was no sooner departed for Bouillon, which was the place of his new retreat, than the citizens of Paris voluntarily fent a deputation to the king, to beg his majesty would return into his capial. He accordingly entered it, and every thing did appeared so peaceable, that it was difficult to ima-gine how a few days before every thing could have been in such consussion. Gaston of Orleans, unforbut tunate in his enterprizes, which he never knew how ourt to execute, was confined at Blois, where he paffed

Ch. the remainder of his days in repentance; and w the fecond of the fons of Henry the great, who di without obtaining great glory. Cardinal de Re who perhaps was as imprudent as he was lofty a audacious, was feized in the Louvre; and, af being removed from prison to prison, he wanden about a long time, and at last ended his days in retreat, in which he acquired those virtues, to whi his great courage, in the variety and agitation of actions and fortunes, had rendered him a stranger

or

C

iua

n

irt

7

.

ne i

pr

eco

he

wea

of

The

he

Bar

wit

den

con

wh

Some counfellors, who had the most remarkat abused their power, were punished for their beh viour by exile: others confined themselves with the bounds of their employment, as magistrates and some of them returned to their duty, in con deration of an annual fum of five hundred crown which were privately paid them by Fouquet, pro curor-general and superintendant of the finances*

In the mean time, the prince of Condé, thou abandoned by almost all his partisans in France, an but ill affisted by the Spaniards, continued a defin Ctive and unhappy war upon the frontiers of Cham pagne. Some disturbances also continued in Bor deaux; but they were foon quelled.

The tranquillity of the kingdom was reftore by the banishment of cardinal Mazarin: neverthe less, tho' he had been forced to retire by the univer fal clamours of the people, and by an express de claration from the king, yet Lewis presently after fending for him b, Mazarin returned, and was aftonished to find that he entered Paris with the same power as before, and without the least disturbance Lewis XIV. received him as his father, and the people as their master. An entertainment was made for him in the Hotel-de-ville, in the midst of the acclamations of the citizens; and, on this occasion, ^{*} Memoires de Gourville. h March 1653.

dw

o die

Ret

y a

aft

den

Si

whi

of

ger. kall

beh

with

ates

conf

OWN

pro

25 * oug

an ftru

ham

Bor

tore rthe

iver

de

afte

afto-

fame

ance.

d the

f the

fion, he

n. 5. threw money among the populace: but it is d, that, in his joy for so happy an exchange, he pressed a contempt for our inconstancy. rliament, though it had before set a price upon s head, as upon a public robber, now fent depus to compliment him: and this very parliament on after condemned the prince of Condé to lose s life, for a contempt in not appearing to answer Such changes are common in fuch s accufation. rcumstances; but this was more mortifying than ual, as by their arrets, they condemned a pern in whose crimes they had themselves so long articipated.

The cardinal, who hastened this condemnation Condé, soon after married one of his nieces to ne prince of Conti, Condé's brother: which was proof, that the power of this minister was now ecoming boundless.

CHAPTER V.

The state of France, to the death of Cardinal Mazarin, in 1661.

WHILE the state had been thus diffracted and torn within, it had been attacked and weakened from without. The fruits of the battles of Rocroi, Lens, and Norlingen, were all lost. The important fortress of Dunkirk was retaken by he Spaniards, who also drove the French out of Barcelona, and retook Casal in Italy 1, Yet, notwithstanding the disorders of a civil, and the burden of a foreign war, Mazarin was so happy as to conclude that celebrated peace of Westphalia k, by made which the emperor and the empire fold to the king and

a

y fo

e

w

ein

W

u

T

ey

at

et

e

ho

ret

nip

er I

blo

eco

va

ut

VC

and crown of France the fovereignty of Alface, h three millions of livres, payable to the archduke which fum makes fix millions of the present mone of France. By this treaty also, which became to basis of all future treaties, a new electorate w created in favour of the house of Bavaria. The rights of all the princes, the imperial towns, a the privileges of the most inconsiderable of the Go mans, were confirmed. The emperor's powerwa confined within narrower bounds, and the French being united with the Swedes, became the legifle tors of Germany. But this glory, obtained by France, was due, at least in part, to the arms of Sweden; for Gustavus Adolphus had given the fift shock to the imperial power; and his generals had pushed their conquests very considerably under the government of his daughter Christina. Her general, Wrangel, also, was upon the point of entering Austria; and count Konigsmark had become master of one half of the city of Prague, and was befieging the other, when this peace was concluded. And, to humble the emperor in this manner, cost France very little more than a million paid annually to the Swedes. Sweden, by these treaties, did, indeed, gain greater advantages than France; for the obtained Pomerania, together with many towns; and a confiderable fum of Money. She also forced the emperor to transfer certain benefices, which belonged to the Roman catholics, into the hands of the Lutherans, Rome exclaimed against this as an impiety, and declared, that the cause of God was betrayed. But the Protestants, on the contrary, boafted they had fanctified the peace by thus robbing the Papists. All mankind fpeak as they are prompted by their interests. Spain duke none

ne t

e w

T

, an

Ger

erw

end

gilla

d by

ns of

e first

s had

er the

r ge-

nter-

come

and

con-

man-

paid

trea-

with

ney.

be-

in-

med

the

nts,

the

kind

pain

Spain was not included in this peace, and for d reasons: for perceiving that France was nged in civil wars, the Spanish minister hoped reap advantage from our divisions: and the Gern troops, being now disengaged, became an adonal succour to the Spaniards. The emperor, in r years time from the peace of Westphalia, caused in thirty thousand men to march into Flanders; ich was a manisest violation of the treaties; but eed, treaties are seldom executed otherwise. In this treaty of Westphalia, the ministers of the

In this treaty of Westphalia, the ministers of the art of Madrid had the address to conclude a serate peace with Holland; and the Spanish monary at last thought itself happy in acknowledging sovereigns, and no longer having for its enees, those whom it had so long treated as rebels, worthy of pardon. These republicans increased eir riches, and strengthened their peace and their wer, by concluding a peace with Spain, and containing to preserve it with France.

They became so powerful, that, in a war which ey had some time after with England, they sent at a fleet of an hundred ships of the line; and the story frequently remained doubtful between Blake e English admiral, and the Dutch admiral Tromp, ho were by sea what the Condès and Turennes were by land. France, at that time, had not ten hips of fifty guns in a condition to put to sea; and er marine was declining daily.

Lewis XIV. therefore, in 1653, found himself blolute master of a kingdom, which was not yet ecovered from the shocks it had received; which was disordered in every part of the administration, but which nevertheless had great resources; destitute even of one single ally, except Savoy, to enable him to maintain an offensive war, and having no longer any foreign enemies, except Spain which was then even in a worse condition than France. All the Vol. I.

people of France, who had been engaged in h t 25 0 r

re

thi

T

lt th

itt

caf

gn

are

d, ras

to t nne

SC

th

ur

m :

s n T

oug

eare

laza erfo

ini 0

ran

Don hili

am

Lew

civil war, were subjected, or returned voluntarily their duty, except the prince of Condé, and fo few of his partifans; one or two of which con nued constant to him through friendship, or gre ness of soul; such as the counts de Coligni; Bouteville; and the others, because the court fused to purchase them at too high a price.

Condé, now become general of the Spanifi mies, was unable to restore a party which hel himself weakened, by the destruction of their fantry in the battles of Rocroi and Lens. He for at the head of new forces, of which he was master, against the old French regiments, which learned to conquer under him, and which we commanded by Turenne.

It was the fortune of Turenne and Condé to always victorious, when they fought at the head the French, and to be vanquished when they on manded the Spaniards. Turenne, when, from neral to the king of France, he had made him lieutenant to Don Estevan de Gamarra, had sa been able to fave the shattered remains of the Span army in the battle of Retel.

The prince of Condé had the same fate before Arras : he, and the archduke, besieged that Turenne attacked them in their camp, and force their lines: the troops of the archduke were cut pieces; and Condé, with two regiments of Fren and Lorrainians, alone sustained the efforts of I renne's army; and, while the archduke was flying he defeated the marshal d'Hoquincourt, repul the marshal de la Fertè, and retreated victorion himself, by covering the retreat of the vanquish Spaniards. The king of Spain, in his letter to his after this engagement, had these words: I has

c August 25. 1654.

n informed, that every thing was loft, and that have recovered every thing.

It is difficult to determine what it is that gains or of the greatest genius's in war that the world

h.

n

for gra

620

r produced, and that the archduke and his counrefused to do any thing which Condé proposed this engagement.

The relieving of Arras, the forcing of the lines, at the deseat of the archduke, crowned Turenne th glory: but it is remarkable, that, in the letter itten in the king's name to the parliament *, on as casion of this victory, the whole success of the camch gnwas attributed to Mazarin, and that the name of a we are me was not even mentioned. The cardinal d, indeed, been at some leagues distance from d, indeed, been at some leagues distance from d, indeed, been at some leagues distance from to tras, with the king; and he had even entered to the camp, at the siege of Stenai, which Tunne had taken, before he succoured Arras. Countons of war had also been held in his presence; and, him this foundation, he assumed to himself the hosour of these great actions; but this vanity made mappear so ridiculous, that all the authority of s ministry could not efface it.

m appear so ridiculous, that all the authority of s ministry could not efface it.

The king was not present in the battle of Arras, ough he might have been there. He had apford ared in the trenches at the siege of Stenai; but lazarin would not suffer him farther to expose his Frent erson, whereon the repose of the state, and the of To inister's power, seemed absolutely to depend.

Sym On one side, Mazarin, being absolute master of rance, and of the young king; and, on the other, orion on Lewis de Haro, who governed Spain, and wish hilip IV.; continued the war, under their masters to him ames, though but with little vigour on either part.

I have Lewis XIV. was not yet known in the world;

E 2

^{*} Dated from Vincennes, September 11. 1554.

3

eal

m.

an

ir,

on

for

er

Me

Al

e a

d (

icer

urd

e t

teer

Mi.

ts c

cto

tisfa

oft

Th

king

offer

he ke

lo fi

bled

tranc

Th

ot v

and the king of Spain had never been remarkab There was not a fing e crowned head in Euro who had any share of personal glory. Chris queen of Sweden was the only potentate who verned by herfelf, and supported the dignity of throne, though abandoned, disregarded, or known, in the other nations of Europe.

Charles 11. king of England, who was a fugit in France, with his mother and brother, brown with him his misfortunes, and his hopes. Engla Scolland, and Ireland, were subjected by a prin person; and Cromwell, an usurper, worthy reign, had affumed the title of protector, and that of king; because the English knew how fart prerogative of their kings should extend, but we ignorant of the bounds to the authority of am tector.

He increased his power, by knowing when was proper to restrain it: he made no attempts those privileges, of which the people were jealor foldiers were never quartered in the city of La don: he imposed no taxes, that might occasi murmurs: he did not offend the eyes of the pa lic, by appearing with too great pomp and gra deur: he did not indulge himself in any pleasurs he accumulated no treasures: and he took care have justice administred with that strict impartials which makes no distinction between the high z f De the low, the rich and the poor.

The brother of Pantaleon, embassador in En land from the court of Portugal, thinking his to haviour would be regarded with impunity, becan eft b the person of his brother was sacred, insulted of tain citizens of London, and caused one of the to be affassinated, to revenge the resistance of the others; but he was condemned to be hanged; # Cromwell, though he might have pardoned him without fuffered him to be executed; and the next day ig quells

ed a treaty with theemballador.

Com

Commerce had never been so flourishing, or fo e, before; and England had never before been rich. Her victorious fleets made her name rected throughout the world; while Mazarin, befolely engaged in enriching himself, and inealing his own power, suffered the justice, the mmerce, the marine, and even the finances, of ance, to languish and decay. After the civil on well had done for England: but Mazarin was foreigner; and, as he had not the barbarity, neier had he the grandeur of foul, which Comwell Messed.

All the nations of Europe, which had neglected e alliance of England, under the reigns of James d Charles, sollicited it under the protestor: and teen Christina herself, though she detested the urder of Charles I. entered into an alliance with e tyrant; whom she could not but admire and

fteem.

rob riff

0 8

of 1

giti

00 gla

hy

dn

ar t

MO

a pa

eal

ots e

los Los

cafin

pd

Mazarin and Don Lewis de Haro used all their its of policy, to unite themselves with the propu octor; and Cromwell, for some time, enjoyed the grantisfaction of seeing himself courted by the two with nost powerful kingdoms in Europe.

The Spanish minister offered to assist him in

The Spanish minister offered to assist him in king Calais: Mazarin proposed to him the siege of Dunkirk, and the putting of that place in his offession: and thus Cromwell had his choice of the keys both of France and Flanders. He was so to solicited by the prince of Condé; but he restant lied to negotiate with a prince, who had nothing est but his title, and who was without a party in the stance, and without power among the Spaniards. The protector declared himself, at last, for France; but without concluding any particular treaty, and without making any previous partition of contucts: for he proposed to illustrate his usurpation

fig quests; for he proposed to illustrate his usurpation prin eive

n

d ri

e

er,

d

1

m

d

ad

T

re

pa

tcl

gai

cec

ou

ho

uke

p

hele

rere

b th

T

ario

rith

e e

Con

eing

f A

de

hal

Vale

T

11

Ch.

by greater enterprizes. His'defign was, to depri the Spaniards of America; but they receive timely notice of it. Cromwell's admirals, need theless, took Jamaica from them d; which islands English still possess, and which secures their con merce in the new world. It was not till after! expedition to Jamaica, that Cromwell figned treaty with the king of France: which he de without making, as yet, any mention of Dualit The protector treated with him as his equal, a forced the king to acknowlege his title of protecting His fecretary figned the treaty, before the plean tentiary of France; and he acted like a real supering by obliging the king of France to cause Charles II and the duke of York, who were the grandfons Henry IV. and to whom France owed an afylm to depart out of his dominions.

While Mazarin was concluding this treaty Charles II. demanded one of his daughters in mariage: but the bad state of his affairs, which compelled this prince to such a behaviour, also detupon him a refusal: and the cardinal has enabled to the support to the daughter which he refused to the king of England, mariato the son of Cromwell. It is, at least, certain that, when Mazarin afterwards perceived it becauses difficult for Charles II. to regain his crown, are renewed the proposal of marriage, and was resulted.

in his turn.

Henrietta of France, who was the mother these two princes, and the daughter of Henry to Great, having been in France for some time, with out any support, was reduced to the necessity requesting the cardinal to solicit Cromwell, to he would, at least, return her dowry. This was certainly the severest of all humiliations, to he

1. 5.

eprin

cein

Dere

ndt

COD

er H

ed li

, za

enipo

erio

es II

ylun

realy

dra com

eve

gitt

ams

ecam

WE,

eful

her o

ry th

Hity o

1, 1

is wa

to b

npelle

mpelled to beg a subsistence from the man who dished her husband's blood upon a scaffold. Marin made some faint solicitations in England, in ename of this queen; and soon after informed in, that they had been without success. Henrietta, erefore, continued at Paris, in a state of poverty, ind under the shame of having implored the pity of Cromwell; and her children entered into the my of Condé, and Don John of Austria, to learn and practise the art of war against France, which ad abandoned them.

The children of Charles I. being obliged to rere out of France, had taken refuge in Spain. The panish ministers, in all the foreign courts, loudly telaimed, both in writing, and in their discourses, gainst a cardinal, who had thus, said they, sacriced all laws, both divine and human, and all hoour and religion, to the murderer of a king; and sho had banished out of France Charles II. and the size of York, who were the cousins of Lewis XIV.
To please their father's executioner. In answer to see exclamations of the Spaniards, only the offers were produced, which they themselves had made the protector.

The war in Flanders constantly continued with arious success. Turenne having, in conjunction with the marshal de la Ferté, besieged Valenciennes, a experienced the same reverse of fortune, which condé had suffered before Arras. The prince, sing seconded, upon this occasion, by Don John Austria, who was more worthy to sight by his ide than the archduke, e forced the lines of marhal de la Ferté, took him prisoner, and delivered Valenciennes.

Turenne now did what Condé had formerly done, na defeat of the same kind. He saved the vanquish-

[•] July 17. 1656.

ed army, and every-where sustained the attacks the enemy; and, even in a month after, he belies ed and took the little town of La Capelle; which perhaps, was the first time a vanquished army date to undertake a siege. This celebrated marche Turenne, after which la Capelle was taken, wa eclipsed by another march, still more glorious, b the prince of Condé: Turenne had no sooner be fieged Cambray, than Condé, at the head of tw thouland cavalry, pierced through the army of the besiegers; and, having vanquished whoever offer to oppose his passage, f he threw himself into the city; the inhabitants of which received their dell verer upon their knees. Thus thefe two great ge nerals, being opposed against each other, displayed the various resources of their genius. They were admired in their retreats, as well as in their victories, in their good conduct, and even in their errors, which they always knew how to repair. abilities, by tuens, put a stop to the progress of both parties: but the disorder which reigned in the finances, both of France and Spain, was a fill greater obstacle to their fuccess.

The alliance concluded with Cromwell, at land gained France a more distinguished superiority: on one side admiral Blake burnt the Spanish galleons, near the Canaries, and deprived them of the only treasures with which the war could be supported: on another side, twenty English ships blocked up the port of Dunkirk; and Turenne's army was reinforced by six thousand veterans, who had effected the revolution in England.

Dunkirk, which was the most important fortress in Flanders, was besieged, both by sea and land. Condé and Don John of Austria, having assembled their forces, appeared to relieve the place. The

h.

res

nal

eat

to

e v

pai

ous f R

T

n t

00

as

The

arr

Lev

ing

100 whe

abl

Lev

leu

and

dor

Lo

atte

270

1

-

ks o

fier

hid

dare

che

Wa

s, b

r be

tw

file

Fere

o the

deli-

t ge-

ayed

West

cto-

rors,

heir

s of

1 the

fil

12

: 01

ons,

only

ted:

d up

re-

Eted

tres

and.

bled

The

eyes

res of all Europe were fixed on this event. Carnal Mazarin conducted Lewis XIV. near the eatre of war; but would not suffer him to enter to it, though he was now near twenty years old. It was at Calais, while his army attacked that of pain, near the Dunes, and gained the most gloous victory that had been obtained since the battle f Rocroi g.

The genius of the prince of Condé could not, in this occasion, do any thing against the superior roops of France and England. The Spanish army was destroyed; and Dunkirk soon after surrendered. The king hastened, with his minister, to see the arrison march out. The cardinal did not permit Lewis XIV. to appear either as a general, or a sing: he had no money to distribute among the roops; nor had scarce a houshold of his own: for, when he was in the army, he was always at the ables either of Mazarin or Turenne.

This neglect of the royal dignity did not, in Lewis XIV. proceed from any contempt of grandeur; but from the confused state of his affairs, and the care which Mazarin took to unite all splendor and authority in himself.

Lewis entered Dunkirk, only to deliver it up to Lockhart, the embassador of Cromwell. Mazarin attempted, by his finesse, to elude the treaty, and avoid giving up the place: but Lockhart menaced; and Italian policy was subdued by English positive-tess.

It is affirmed by many persons, that the cardinal, who attributed the affair of Arras to himself, enceavoured also to make Turenne cede to him the honour of the battle of Dunes. It is said, that Du Bec-Crepin, count de Moret, came from the minister, to propose to the general the writing of s June 14. 1658.

a letter, wherein it should appear, that the cardin had, himself regulated the whole plan of the operations: but Turenne rejected this proposal with contempt, and refused to say that which would only have brought shame upon himself, as general and ridicule upon the cardinal, as a churchman and Mazarin, who had been guilty of this weaked had also that of continuing to be at variance with Turenne, as long as he lived.

Some time after the fiege of Dunkirk, Cromwe died, aged 55 years, in the midst of the project h: was forming to strengthen his own power, in increase the glory of his nation. He had humble Holland, fo ced a treaty upon Portugal, vanquil ed Spain, and obliged France to folicit his support Not long before he died, being told with what haughtiness his admirals had behaved at Lisbon, he faid; I would have the English republic respected as much as the Roman republic was of old. It's not true, that he affected the enthuliast and the false prophet at his death, as has been reported by fome writers: and it is certain, that, in his death, he shewed the same unshaken firmness of soul which he had always manifested in every actional He was interred like a legal monarch and left behind him the reputation of a great king which mitigated his crime of usurpation.

Sir William Temple says, that Cromwell, before his death, was desirous to unite with Spain against France: and, with the assistance of the Spanish forces, to obtain Calais, as he had Dunkirk by the assistance of the French. Such a design was, indeed, agreeable to his character and policy; and he would have rendered himself the idol of the people of England, by thus depriving of their principal towns, one after the other, two nations, which were equally hated by his own.

It

h I

en

ay

ad

F

rit

he

VO

H

ue

His

Dli

bci

vhi

nig

he

0

he

the

con

pri

of

day

afic

into

the

hap

kno

ma

kno

Ne

the

1,51

C

W

rdin

Vou

neral

man

enel.

wit

n we

oject

and

nble

wif.

port.

what

bon,

ettel

Itis

the

ed by

eath,

foul,

on of

arch

king

efore

gainst

anish

y the

, in-

nd he

eople

cipal

vhich

It

It is remarkable, that the whole court of France ent into mourning for Cromwell, except Maemoiselle, who was the only-person that did not ay this respect to the memory of the man who ad murdered a king that was her relation.

Richard Gromwell succeeded peaceably, and rithout opposition, to the protectorship of his faher, in the same manner as a prince of Wales vould have succeeded to a king of England.

Richard shewed, that the fate of a state may freuently depend upon the character of a fingle man, his disposition was quite different from that of Oliver Cromwell. He had all the gentleness of the ocial virtues, and none of that intrepid ferocity, which facrifices all things to its own interest. night have preserved the inheritance which his faher's labour had obtained, if he would have put o death three or four of the principal officers in he army, who opposed his elevation: but he raher chose to resign the government, than reign by committing affaffinations. He retired and lived privately, and in a manner unknown, to the age of 90 years, in a country, of which, for a few days, he had been the fovereign. Immediately after his relignation of the protectorship, he went into France: and it is known, that, at Montpellier, the prince of Conti, brother to the great Condé happening one day to converse with him, without mowing him, faid: Oliver Cromwell was a great man; but his fon Richard was a wretch, not to know how to enjoy the fruits of his father's crimes. Nevertheless, Richard lived happily, which his father never had done.

Some time before this, France beheld a yet more remarkable example of the contempt of royalty. Christina, queen of Sweden, came to Paris. She was a young queen, who was regarded with admiration,

Ch

Ch. 5

ration, for having, at the age of twenty-seven years, renounced a sovereignty of which she was worthy, for the sake of freedom and tranquillity. It is scandalous in the Protestant writers to have said, without the least foundation, that she resigned her crown, only because she was unable to preserve it any longer. She had conceived the design at the age of twenty years, and waited seven years to bring it to maturity. Such a resolution, so superior to vulgar ideas, and which she had so long meditated, ought to silence those who reproaches with sickleness, and an involuntary abdication. One of these reproaches does indeed destroy the other but the actions of great souls are always sure to be attacked by little minds.

To discover the peculiar genius of this queen, we need only read her letters. In that which the wrote to Chanut, formerly embassador to her from France, she expresses herself thus: "I have pol-" fessed without vanity or oftentation; and I resign " with chearfulness: therefore, have no fears about " me; for my happiness is above the power of " fortune." To the prince of Conde the wrote in these terms: "I think myself as much honoured " in your esteem, as by the crown which I have " worn. If, after having refigned it, you think " me less worthy of it, I will then confess, that me " repose I have so ardently desired, costs me dear: " but I shall not, however, repent the having pur-" chased it, even at the expence of a crown; nor " will ever difgrace an action, which to me appeared fo laudable, by a mean and weak repentance; " and if you should condemn me, all that I can offer in my justification, is, that I should not " have difregarded the favours which fortune had " showered upon me, had I thought them neces-" fary to my happiness; and that I might have or pretended even to the empire of the world, if I

"

and fhe lang of hol

pro con

fon ma grii jec

> a p bet fac illit the kno of ther profix the

the indifered men

pafs and rati

it is her

the hin

cc could

" could have been as certain to succeed, or die in " the attempt, as the great Condé.

ven

was ity.

lave

ned

erve

the

to

ipe.

ong her

ORC

er:

o be

een,

fhe

pof-

fign bout

r of

ured

have

hink

tine

ear:

pur-

nor

ear.

nce;

can

had ecel-

have, if I could

Such was the genius of this singular personage; and fuch was her stile in writing French, though the had feldom spoken it. She understood eight languages: she had been the friend and disciple of Descartes, who died in her palace at Stockholm, after having been unable to obtain fo much as a pension in France, where his works were even prohibited, only for the good things which they contained. She had drawn all those ingenious perfons of the age into Sweden, who could in any manner contribute to her information. The chagrin of not finding any fuch among her own fubjects, had given her a disgust against reigning over a people who were mere foldiers. She thought it better to live with men who cultivated their rational faculties, than to command over those who were illiterate, and without genius. She had studied all the sciences in a climate where they were then unknown. Her design was to retire into the centre of them in Italy; and the came into France only in her way thither; for the arts had then made but little progress among us. Her taste determined her to fix at Rome; and, with this design, she quitted the Lutheran religion for the Catholic; she was indifferent with regard to either, and made no scruple to conform, in appearance, to the sentiments of the people with whom she intended to pass her life. She resigned her crown in 1654. and publicly performed the ceremony of her abjuration at Inspruck. She was well received by the court of France, though there was not a woman in it with a genius equal to her own. The king faw her, and paid her great honours; but he scarce spoke to her: for, being brought up in ignorance, the good fense with which he was born, rendered him timid.

le

ti

p

at

CC

h

th

ha

fo

of

Ы

pa

CO

pr

th

an

fue

án

m

ker

car

the

the

kin

pri

the

din

in t

his

bei

him

ter

107

oth

mo

Most of the women, and others of the court, could perceive nothing farther in this philosophical queen, than that her head was not dreffed in the French fashion, and that she danced ill. The most fensible people condemned her only for the murder of Monaldeschi, whom in a second journey which fhe made to Paris, fine caused to be affassinated at Fontainbleau. Whatever might have been his crime with regard to her, as the had renounced her throne, she had no longer any right to do herself iustice in this manner. It was not a queen that punished a crime against the state, but a woman who finished an amour by a murder. The shame and cruelty of this action, was a difgrace to that philofophy which had made her refign her crown. In England she would have been punished; but, in France, this infult on the king's authority, against the laws of nations, and against humanity, was passed over in silence.

After the death of Cromwell, and the deposition of his fon, England, for the space of a year, was in the confusion of anarchy. Charles-Gustavus, on whom Christina had conferred the crown of Sweden, rendered himself formidable in the North, and in Germany. The emperor Ferdinand had died in 1657. and his fon Leopold, aged 17 years, who was king of Hungary and Bohemia, had not been elected king of the Romans in his father's life-time. Mazarin was desirous to make Lewis XIV. emperor: but the defign was chimerical; as it would be necessary either to force or corrupt the electors: and France was neither rich enough to purchase the empire, nor strong enough to obtain it by force. Accordingly, the first overtures made at Frankfort by the marshal de Grammont and Lionne were rejected as soon as proposed. Leopold was elected: and all that Mazarin's policy could effect, was the conclusion of a league league with the German princes, for the observation of the treaties of Munster, and to curb the emperor's authority over the empire.

France, after the battle of Dunes, was powerful abroad, by the glory of its arms, and by the bad condition of all the European nations: but, at home, it was distressed by the want of money, and the want of peace.

urt,

the

nof

rder

nich

d at

his

her

felf

pu-

who

and

ilo.

In

in.

inft

was osi-

ear,

fta.

nwo

the

er-

old,

and

ans

s to

was rce

her

ong

the

de

as

Ma-

of a

gue

The inhabitants of the several nations of Europe have scarce ever any interest in the wars of their sovereigns. Mercenary armies, raised by the order of a minister, and commanded by a general who blindly obeys him, often make several ruinous campaigns, while the kings, in whose names they fight, conceive not the least hope, or even design, to deprive one another of their dominions. The victors, tho' they are at ever so much expense, never gain any thing of the vanquished: in the good or ill success of their arms they are equally sufferers; and peace is almost as necessary to them after the most signal victory, as when their enemies have taken their frontier towns.

Two things were necessary to be done by the cardinal to crown his ministry with success; and these were to conclude a peace, and to secure the tranquillity of the state, by marrying the king. After the campaign of Dunkirk, this prince had been taken fo dangerously ill, they were in great fears for his life. The cardinal, who was not beloved by the king's brother, in this danger, took the necessary measures to secure his immense riches, and his retreat. Lewis XIV. being recovered, the cardinal determined to marry him immediately. He cast his eyes on the daughter of the king of Spain, and the princels of Savoy: but the king's affections were engaged another way: he was paffionately in love with Mademoiselle Manceni, one of the cardinal's nieces:

and

Ch

ang

legi

of

iag

peri

Spa

ant

first

Th

riag

end

that

heir

into an i

fon

wit

kin

batt

ceff

mar

Le

tier

riag

Wer

mo

210 ties

in

teig

ALD.

On

M

and as he was born with a tender heart, and a firmness in his resolutions, having also an high spirit, and being without experience, it was more than probable he might resolve to marry his mistress.

Madam de Motteville, who was the favourite of the queen-mother, and whose memoirs have a great air of truth, pretends, that Mazarin was tempted to favour the king's passion, in hopes to place his niece upon the throne. He had before married another niece to the prince of Conti, and another to the duke de Mercœur; and she with whom Lewis XIV. was enamoured, had been demanded in marriage by the king of England. These were all so many titles which might justify his ambition. contrived artfully to found the queen-mother on this head: I am afraid, said he to her, that the king's paffion will hurry him on to marry my niece. The queen, who was perfectly acquainted with the minister, perceived, that, in his heart, he wished what he pretended to fear: and she answered him with the dignity of a princess of the Austrian blood, who was the daughter, wife, and mother of kings; and with the indignation with which she had for some time been inspired by this minister, who affected no longer to depend upon her: If the king was capable of committing so dishonourable an action, ! would put myfelf, and my second son, at the head of the whole nation, against you and the king.

Mazarin, it is said, never pardoned the queen for making this reply: but his prudence determined him to conform to her sentiments; and he assumed to himself a kind of honour and merit from opposing the passion of Lewis XIV. tho, indeed, his power did not want support from a queen of his own blood; besides, he feared the character of his niece; and therefore concluded he should establish his power more firmly, by slying from the dange-langerous glory of raising his house to too great a degree of elevation.

5. m.

irit,

han

of

eat

ted

his

an-

to

Wis

ar.

fo

He

his

g's he

ni-

hat

ith

ho

ind

me

ted

vas

, 1

en

in-

af-

mo

ed,

of

of

12-

the

ge-

He had fent Lionne into Spain, in the year 1656. o sollicit peace, and demand the infanta in mariage for the king; but Don Lewis de Haro, being persuaded that France was altogether as weak as Spain, had rejected the cardinal's offers. The inanta, who was the king of Spain's daughter by his fift marriage, was defigned for young Leopold. The king of Spain, at the time of his second marriage, had only one fon, whose unhealthy infancy endangered his life. It was therefore determined, that the infanta, who might probably become the heirels of fuch great domains, should carry her right into the house of Austria, and not into the house of an enemy. But at last Philip IV. having another fon, Don Philip Prosper, and his wife being again with child, the danger in giving the infanta to the king of France appeared less imminent, and the battle of Dunes rendered peace in a manner neceffary.

The Spaniards promifed the infanta, and demanded a suspension of arms. Mazarin and Don Lewis met in the isle of Pheasants, upon the frontiers of France and Spain: but though the marriage of a king of France, and a general peace, were the objects of their conferences, yet above a month was spent in adjusting the difficulties which trose in regard to precedency, and other ceremonies. Cardinals considered themselves as equal in dignity to kings, and superior to lesser sovereigns: and France pretended, with the greatest appearance of justice, to a pre-eminence over other kings: nevertheless, Don Lewis de Haro insisted on an equality between himself and the cardinal, and between France and Spain.

The conferences continued four months; and Mazarin and Don Lewis displayed the utmost strength strength of their policy. The cardinal's confisted in cunning, Don Lewis's in circumspection. The latter scarce ever faid any thing; and what the former faid was always equivocal. The genius of the Italian minister displayed itself in deceit, and that of the Spaniard in avoiding being deceived. pretended Don Lewis said of the cardinal, that he was guilty of a great error in politics, in that k always studied how to deceive.

Such is the viciflitude of all human affairs, that not even two articles now subsist of this famous Pyrenean treaty. The king of France retained Roufillon, which he always would have done without this peace. In regard to Flanders, the Spanish monarchy no longer possesses any thing there. We were at that time necessarily the friends of Portugal; but now we are so no longer. All things are changed. And if Don Lewis de Haro then faid, the cardinal could deceive, we have ourselves fince found, that he could foresee. He had long meditated an alliance between France and Spain; as a proof of which, that famous letter of his, written during the negotiations of Munster, is cited. "If the most Christian king could obtain the " Low Countries and Franche-Comte, as a dowry " with the infanta, then, notwithstanding any re-" nunciation she may be obliged to make, we " might aspire to the Spanish succession; nor " would this be a very distant expectation, as there " is only the life of the prince her brother that can " exclude her from it." This prince was Balthazar, who died in 1649.

The cardinal was palpably deceived in supposing, that the Low Countries and Franche-Comté might be given in marriage with the infanta: for not even a fingle town was stipulated as her dowry. On the contrary, a restitution was made to the Spanish monarchy of several considerable towns, which had been

Ch

bee

den

we

ima

less

for

pri

wa

WO

fift

pol

day

XI

feq

fler

the

by

fift

hav

up

onl

pen

kin

cro

hun

fub

and

DO

pre

tha

mig

An

len

be

far

fed

10

the

that

t is

t he

t he

that

ous

ned

ith-

pa-

ere.

or-

ngs

hen

lves

ong

in;

rit-

ted.

the

wry

re-

we

nor

pere

can

Bal-

ing,

ight

ven

the

nish

had

peen

been conquered; as St. Omer, Ypres, Menin, Oudenarde, and others. Some of these towns also were retained. The cardinal was not mistaken in imagining the renunciation would one day be useles; but then those who attribute honour to him for this prediction, do also make him foresee, that prince Balthazar would die in 1649; that, afterwards, his three children, by his fecond marriage, would all die in their infancy; that Charles, the fifth of all these male children, would die without posterity; and that this Austrian king would one day make a will in favour of a grandfon of Lewis XIV. Mazarin, however, did foresee the consequence of renunciations, in case the male poflerity of Philip IV. should become extinct; and the reasonableness of his conjectures was justified by very frange events, which happened more than fifty years after.

It being probable, that Maria-Theresa would have those towns for her dowry, which were given up by France, she, by her marriage-contract, had only five hundred thousand crowns, though the expence of receiving her upon the frontiers cost the king a larger sum. These five hundred thousand crowns, which were then equal to two millions five hundred thousand livres, were, nevertheless, the subject of great disputes between the two ministers; and all that France received at last, amounted to no more than one hundred thousand franks.

This marriage was so far from bringing any other present or real advantage, besides that of peace, that the infanta renounced all her right which she might ever have to any of her father's dominions. And this renunciation was ratisfied in the most solemn manner by Lewis XIV. who also caused it to be registred in the parliament.

These renunciations, and these five hundred thousand crowns, seem to be the ordinary conditions of marriage

Ch.

muc

or

Cro

eli

for i

offe

Th

all t

felv

kno

for

the

und

nio

Eu

mu

wa:

fub

I h

this

pre

nev

pec

in r

fior

in p

XI

I

and

ma

his

Ma

po

of

pre

ly

as

in

marriage between the infantas of Spain and the kings of France. Anne of Austria, the daughter of Philip III. was married to Lewis XIII. on these conditions: and when Isabella, the daughter of Henry IV. was married to Philip IV. king of Spain, no more was stipulated for her dowry than sine hundred thousand crowns, of which he never received any part: so that it does not appear there was then any advantage in these grand matches; and the daughters of kings were married to kings, without having scarce a necessary nuptial present.

Charles IV. duke of Lorrain, of whom France and Spain had great cause to complain, or, rather, who had himself great reason to complain of them, was comprised in this treaty; but he was included as an unfortunate prince, whom they punished because he could not make himself respected. France restored him his tetritories, but demolished Nancy, and forbade him to have any forces. Don Lewisde Haro obliged cardinal Mazarin to get the prince of Condé pardoned, and again received into favour, by threatning to give him the fovereignty of Rocroi, Catelet, and other places, of which he was in possession. And thus France gained these towns, and recovered the great Condé, both together. Condé had lost his post of grand-master of the king's houshold, and returned destitute of every thing but glory.

Charles II. titular king of England, who was then more unfortunate than the duke of Lorrain, came within a small distance of the Pyreneans, where this peace was negotiating; and implored the assistance of Don Lewis and Mazarin. He statered himself, that their masters, who were his cousin-germans, being reconciled, would at last dare to revenge what ought to be regarded by all sovereigns as their common cause; more especially as Gromwell was now no more: but he could not so much

ater

refe

of

ain,

five

re.

ere

es;

igs,

.

nce

er,

em,

ded

be-

nce

cy,

s de

of

ur,

20.

was

ns,

ner.

the

ery

was

ain,

ıns,

red

at-

his

are

ve-

as

t fo

uch

nuch as obtain an interview, either with Mazarin or Don Lewis. Lockhart, the embassador of Cromwell, was at St. John de Luz, and made himelf still respected even after the protector's death; for the two ministers, through fear lest they should offend this embassador, refused to see Charles II. They thought his restoration impossible; and that all the English parties, tho' divided among themfelves, would unanimously agree never again to acknowledge kings. But they were both mistaken; for fortune, a few months after, did that which these two ministers might have had the glory of undertaking. Charles was recalled into his dominions by the English; and not a single potentate of Europe ever endeavoured to prevent the father's murder, or favour the restoration of his son. He was received at Dover by twenty thousand of his subjects, who fell upon their knees before him: and I have been told by some old men, who were of this number, that hardly any of those who were present could refrain from tears. Perhaps there never was so tender a scene between a king and his people, or a more sudden revolution. It was over in much less time than was employed in the conclution of the Pyrenean treaty; and Charles II. was in peaceable possession of England, before Lewis XIV. was married even by proxy.

Mazarin at last returned to Paris, with the king and the new queen. A father, who should have married his son without suffering him to partake of his patrimony, would not have done otherwise than Mazarin did upon this occasion: he returned more powerful, and more jealous of his power, and even of his honour, than ever. He no longer gave precedency to the princes of the blood, as formerly; and he, who had treated Don Lewis de Haro as his equal, now treated the great Concé as his inferior. He appeared, upon all occasions, with the grandeur

Ch.

an

av

ho

t

he

ha

n t hin

bo

fee.

rea

infi

reig

at .

thre

ing

not

me

wh

his

ty i can fup

div.

trat Ma

fen

A

equ

let ter fei

1

grandeur and pomp of royalty, having, besides he other guards, a company of foot, which is now the king's second company of musqueteers. Access him was no longer free and open; and if any on was so bad a courtier, as to beg a favour of the king, he was ruined. The queen-mother, who has so long been the obstinate protectress of Mazan against France, was deprived of her power as so as he found he had no longer any occasion for her The king her son, being brought up in a blind submission to the minister, was unable to shake off the yoke which she had imposed both upon him as herself. She repented what she had done; and Lewis XIV. while the cardinal lived, dared not to reign.

A minister is excusable for the evil which he does, when the government is forced into his hands by feuds and animosities; but, in a state of tranquillity, he is culpable for not doing all the good which he might have done. Mazarin did service only to himself, either directly, or in his family. Eight years of absolute power, and undisturbed repose, from the time of his last return to that of his death, were not distinguished by any glorious or useful establishment: for the college of the four nations was the effect only of his last will. He governed the finances like the intendant of a lord that was in debted to him.

The king sometimes demanded money of Fouquet, whose answer was this: Sire, there is none in your majesty's coffers; but the cardinal will lend you some. Mazarin had amassed near two hundred millions of our present money. And we find it affirmed in several memoirs, that he gained part of it by such means as were beneath the dignity of his place. We are told by these writers, that he shared the profits arising from prizes taken by privateers. This, however, was never proved; yet the Hollanders anders suspected him of it; and they would never

5 his to our the

arin

000

her.

υb

tha ad 200

DO

065

19

ity,

a be ight ofe,

ath.

eful

icas

med

10

00-ne en yu

dred

di rt of

fhis

arci

ers. Hol-

des

lave suspected cardinal Richelieu.

It is said, that, at his death he had some scruples, ho' he affected an appearance of courage. He was t least under apprehensions for his riches, of which he made an intire donation to the king; hoping, hat his majesty would restore them to him. And in this he was not deceived; for the king returned him the donation at the end of three days. At last, however, the cardinal died; and none but the king feemed to regret his loss; for this prince had al-ready learned to dissemble. The yoke began to be insupportable to him; and he was impatient to reign. Nevertheless, he affected to appear grieved at that death which put him in possession of his throne.

Lewis XIV. and the court, appeared in mourning for the death of Mazarin; an honour that was not common, tho' Henry IV. had shewn it to the memory of Gabriel d'Etrées.

We shall not here enter into an examination, whether the cardinal was a great minister, or not: his actions will declare what he was; and posterity must form their judgment from them. But we cannot refrain from combating the opinion, which supposes prodigious abilities, and a genius almost divine, in those who have governed empires with some degree of success. It is not a superior penetration that makes statesmen; it is their character. Mankind, however inconsiderable their share of fense may be, all see their own interests nearly alike. A citizen of Bern or Amsterdam, in this respect, is equal to Sejanus, Zimines, Buckingham, Richeleu, or Mazzrin ; but our conduct, and our enterprizes, depend absolutely on our natural dispohions, and our success depends upon for une.

For example : Were Rochelle to have been takin by a genius like pope Alexander VI. or Borgia ew S

Ch. 5

S P m D tu de

da

rdindies tten

fee rtic ace at a hich re t laza ona m;

led Pe on on on on

e w

his fon, he would, under the fanction of the mol facred oath, have drawn the principal inhabitant into his camp, and there put them to death. Mazarin would have got possession of the place two or three years later, by corrupting the inhabitants, and sowing discord among them. Don Lewis de Han would not have risked the hazard of an attempt Richelieu, in imitation of Alexander, laid a boom cross the sea, and entered Rochelle like a conqueror: but had the sea been a little more turbulent, or the English a little more diligent, Rochelle might have been saved, and Richelieu called rash and in considerate.

We may judge of the characters of mankind from their enterprizes: and we may, without scruple, affirm, that pride and revenge were predominant in the soul of Richelieu; and that Mazarin was prudent, artful, and greedy of riches. But, to discover the degree of genius in a minister, it is necessary either to hear him often speak, or to real his writings. What we daily see among courties in general, often happens among ministers: he who has the greatest genius, frequently fails; while he, whose character is distinguished by a greater degree of patience, fortitude, tractableness, and consideration, generally succeeds.

In reading the letters of cardinal Mazarin, and the memoirs of cardinal de Retz, it may easily be perceived, that de Retz was the superior genius. Yet Mazarin was all powerful, and de Retz was proscribed. In short, it is certain, that frequently, to make a powerful minister, nothing more is necessary than an indifferent genius, common sense, and good fortune: but, to make a good minister, the ruling passion should be, a love of the public good. The true great statesman is he who leaves behind him immortal monuments of the service he did to his country.

CHAP.

. 5

mof tann

Ma 0 0

and

Haro

mpt. 000

que.

t, or

ight

d in

ron aple,

ntin

pru-

dif

ne-

read

tiers

who e he.

gree

fide.

and

ce he

A P.

CHAPTER VI.

ewis XIV. governs alone. He forces the Spanish-Austrian branch to give him the precedency, and the court of Rome to make him fatisfaction. He purchases Dunkirk. He affists the Emperor, Portugal, and the States general; and renders his kingdom flourishing and formidable

HERE never was in any court a greater variety of hopes, fears, and intrigue, than when dinal Mazarin approached his last moments. The lies, who had any claim to extraordinary charms, ttered themselves with the hopes of governing a ince of twenty-two years of age, whom love had ready so far seduced, as to make him offer his own to his mistress. The young courtiers hoped fee the reign of favourites revived; and every rticular minister was in expectation of being aced at the head of affairs; for no one imagined, at a king brought up in ignorance of every thing y be re to take upon him the weight of government.

lazarin had studied to prolong the infancy of this was onarch. It was very late before he instructed m; and did it at last only, because the king interest hed upon it.

People were so far from any hope or expectatifer, on of being governed by their sovereign, that, ublic mong all those who had acted under the first mifaves after, there were none who asked the king, when e would hear them: on the contrary, the univer-I question to him was, To whom must we address Voi. I. ourselves?

h.

inc

rnı

the

t t ctic

f a

bul

fol

T

lute

rtai

anc

e a

em

the

er !

tien

ho i

mfe.

the

s tit

erm:

ntate

Fra

per

e w

sin

ly t elec

fcen

igne

fore

lion

evati

e oth

bristi

this

ourselves? to which Lewis XIV. constantly replied To me: and the furprize was increased, when appeared, that he persevered in this resolution. H had, for some time, considered his abilities, an had fecretly made trial of his genius for goven ment. When he had once taken a resolution, always persevered in it to the last moment of h life. He prescribed to each of his ministers to extent of their power; made them give him an a count of all their proceedings, at stated times; in posed in them such a confidence, as was necessar to give a fanction to their ministry; and kept watchful eye over them, that they might not about He began his reign, by regulain their trusts. the finances, which were greatly disordered by long course of rapine.

Discipline was restored among the troops, a well as order in the finances: magnificence and cency adorned his court: brilliancy and grander appeared even in its pleasures: all the arts were couraged; and all contributed to the glory of the king, and of France.

98

This is not the proper place to represent himi his private life, nor in the interior part of his go vernment : we shall consider these in another place It is sufficient here to say, that his people, who fince the death of Henry the Great, had never be held a real king, and who detested the government of a first minister, were filled with admiration, an pleasing hopes, when they beheld Lewis XIV. do ing that at twenty-two years of age, which Hem had done at fifty. If Henry IV. had had a prim minister, he would have been ruined; because the hatred which, in a manner, naturally arises again fuch a person, would have revived a number of to powerful and dangerous factions. If Lewis XIII had not had a minister, such a prince, whose wea and distempered body enervated the vigour of hi mind

lince

ind, would have funk under the weight of gornment. Lewis XIV. might, without danger, her have, or be without, a prime minister : for t the smallest traces now remained of the former ftions; and France now contained only the maf-, and his subjects. He, at first, shewed himf ambitious of every kind of glory; and that he buld make himself as much respected abroad, as folute at home.

1 20

; te

ept i

aim

by 15, 2

d do

ndeu

re en

of the

imi

is go

place

who

er be

nmen

n, an

V. do

Henr

prim

ase th

again

of to

The antient kings of Europe pretend to an ablute equality, in regard to one another; which is rtainly very just and natural; but the kings of ance have always claimed a precedency, to which e antiquity of their race and kingdom intitles em: and, if they have ceded the pre-eminence the emperors, it is, because mankind are scarce er hardy enough to dispute a right established by tient custom. The chief of the German republic, no is an elective prince, of inconsiderable power in mself, has, without dispute, the precedency of the other European sovereigns, on account of stitle of Cæsar, and Charlemagne's heir. His erman chancery did not even give the other postates the title of majesty. Nevertheless, the kings France might dispute the precedency with the perors; for France was the first founder of the e western empire, of which the name only subsin Germany. They had, in their favour, not ly the superiority of an hereditary crown over elective dignizy, but the advantage also of being kended, in a direct line, from fovereigns, who gned over a great monarchy, several centuries fore any of those houses, which are now in poslion of crowns, were arrived at any degree of tvation. They were desirous, at least, to precede XIII e other potentates of Europe. The title of most weath weath was alledged in their favour; but Spain, of hi this title, opposed that of Catholic; and, ever mind fince Charles V. had had a king of France prifer at Madrid, the Spanish pride had always been to far from relinquishing its pretensions to this ra The English, and the Swedes, who do not to allege any of these sirnames, avoid, as much they can, any acknowlegement of this superioring

These pretensions were formerly debated Rome: the popes, who assumed a right to co kingdoms by their bulls, imagined, with a gra appearance of reason, that they had a right to gulate the precedency of crowned heads. T court, where every thing is done with great of mony, was the tribunal before which these vani of greatness were decided. France, when the more powerful than Spain, had always had the periority in these disputes; but after the reign Charles V. Spain had neglected no opportunity placing herself upon an equality. Their pres sions remained undetermined : a step more of in a procession, a chair placed near an altar, or posite to a pulpit, were considered as trium and as giving them a right to this pre-emina The chimerical point of honour in these thin was, at that time, carried to the greatest excels, tween crowned heads; as it was also in regard duels between private persons.

At the entrance of a Swedish embassador London a, the count d'Estrade, the French e bassador, and the baron de Watteville, the embassador of Spain, disputed the precedency. The Saniard, by greater liberality, and a more numer retinue, gained the English populace in his favor and the coach-horses of the French embassador immediately killed: presently after which, the tinue of the count d'Estrade being wounded a dispersed, the Spaniards proceeded in triumph, it their swords drawn.

le

S

ic

П

Ь

rio

ro

e k

nc

un

nb

at ulc

Se

kno

was

Sp

dh

ilia

ards

ime

IV.

al fu

uch

He

SOV

00 teres

hich

pain

d ci

eople

bar

ho,

for क मां कि हा क

con ton

à

her

he

ign

ret

orl

OF

ımp inca

thin

efs,

gard

or i

h d

faro orw

Let

Lewis XIV. being informed of this Infult, treled his embassador from Madrid; ordered that Spain to quit France; broke off the conferences, ich were still continued in Flanders, concerning limits; and directed his father-in-law, Philip IV. be told, that, if he did not acknowlege the fuiority of the crown of France, and repair this ront by a solemn satisfaction, the war should be newed. Philip IV. was unwilling again to plunge kingdom into a new war, for the fake of precency in an embassador; and he therefore sent the unt de Fuentes to declare to the king at Fonnbleau, in presence of all the foreign ministers at were in France, That the Spanish ministers uld never, for the future, have any disputes with fe of France. This, indeed, was not a direct knowlegement of the superiority of France; but was, however, a plain confession of the weakness Spain. This court, which still retained its pride d haughtiness, long secretly murmured at its huiliation. Several of the Spanish ministers after-ards renewed their antient pretensions; and, at imegen, they obtained an equality: but Lewis IV. at the fame time, by his firmness, gained a al superiority in Europe, by making it appear how uch he was to be feared.

He had scarce concluded this affair, so much to sown honour, when he appeared still greater in emb occasion wherein his glory seemed to be less terested. The youth of France, in the wars hich had long been carried on in Italy against pain, had imprinted in the minds of the jealous id circumspect Italians the idea of an impetuous the tople. Italy ragarded all the nations round her led a barbarous, and even the French as barbarians, h, though gayer than the others, were yet more angerous; and who, in the pleasures they introiced, shewed much contempt; and to their de-

F 3

baucheries

baucheries added infult. They were feared in places, and no-where more than in Rome.

The duke de Crequi, embassador to the pop shocked the Italians, by the haughtiness of his haviour; and his domestics, a fort of people wh imitate their masters follies as far as they are able were guilty of the same disorders in Rome, white were committed by our undisciplined youth in h ris; who, at that time, used, every night, to atta the watch appointed for the fecurity of the cirand imagined, these exploits distinguished them men of honour and spirit.

Some of the duke de Crequi's servants havin taken it into their heads to attack a small compan of Corficans (who are the guards of Rome), the put them to flight. The whole body of Corlice being enraged at this, and fecretly animated by Do Mario Chigi, the brother of pope Alexander VII who hated the duke de Crequi, came, in arms, a belieged the embassador's house, fired upon li lady's coach, who was just then entering the palace killed one of her pages, and wounded severald mesticsb. The duke de Crequi quitted Rome, a cufing the pope's relations, and the pope himfel with having favoured this affaffination. The pop deferred making any fatisfaction, as long as h could, being perfuaded, it was only necessary temporize with the French, and that every thin would be forgotten. At the end of four months he caused a Corfican, and one of the Sbirri, tob hanged; and ordered the governor, who was in spected of having authorized the action, to rein out of Rome. But the pope was, presently after in the greatest consternation, to hear, that the king menaced Rome with being besieged; that h had already directed troops to march into Italy make

h.

d

co

ime

m

e m

ore

nd i

gair

iirs

ras

affe

T

ith

fP

nd

me

omi

ut t

t be

e 1

Rom.

uali

ion

pyi

n ac

inal

ourt

o pi

ing o

saf

wich

mpe

he d

court

to th

his r

b August 20. 1662.

n

ope be who had him Pa

n a

pan

the

Da

VII

an

hi hi

lace

1 do

, 20

nfelf

pope

as he

ry t

thing nths

tob

as fo

d that the marshal du Plessis-pralin was appointed command them. The affair, on both fides, beame a national quarrel; and the king was refolved make his own fide respected. The pope, before e made the satisfaction which was demanded, imored the mediation of all the Catholic princes; nd did all that was in his power to animate them gainst Lewis XIV. But the circumstances of afirs were not favourable to the pope: the Empire vas attacked by the Turks; and Spain was embaraffed in an unsuccessful war against Portugal.

The court of Rome only irritated the king, vithout being able to hurt him. The parliament f Provence cited the pope to appear before them; nd caused Avignon to be seized. In former mes, Rome would have thundered forth her exommunications against these violent proceedings; ut these were disregarded now, and even ridiculed. t became necessary for the pope to submit; and e was forced to banish his own brother from Rome; to fend his nephew, cardinal Chigi, in uality of legate à latere, to make the king satisfacion; to disband the Corfican guard; and to creet pyramid in Rome, with an inscription, giving n account of the injury, and the reparation. Carinal Chigi was the first legate ever sent from the ourt of Rome to beg pardon: they used to come prescribe laws, and to impose tenths. ing did not rest satisfied with transient ceremonies, s a fatisfaction for the infult he had received, nor with monuments, which were equally vain and rein impermanent (for he, fome years after, permitted after the demolition of the pyramid): he forced the court of Rome to relinquith Castro and Ronciglione to the duke of Parma; and obliged the pope to stally make the duke of Modena satisfaction, in regard to his right to Gomaccio: and thus, by this insult F 4 he

h

ie in

d

en

L

eac

fyi

g t T

E

ene

has

be

co

A

fift

dee

oul

bdu

ith

aff

cref

e co

our

dv

ated

the

e of

m a

e flo

hers.

terp

id glo

to H

tha

Ch.

he gained the real honour of being the protect of the Italian princes.

At the same time that he thus maintained he dignity, he did not omit to encrease his power His finances, which were excellently managed he Colbert, enabled him to purchase Dunkirk a Mardyke of the king of England, for the sum five millions of livres, at twenty-six livres and sold the mark. Charles II. by his prodigality a poverty, incurred the shame of selling that for money, which had cost the English the price of blow His chancellor Hyde, who was accused of have either counselled or permitted this weak action was afterwards banished by the parliament of England; which often punishes the faults of same rites, and sometimes even judges its kings.

on the fortifications of Dunkirk, both to the last and sea sides; and, between the town and the cite del, a large bason was formed, capable to constitutive ships of war: so that this place became a town to the English almost as soon as they had so

it.

rain to give up to him the strong town of Mark This unfortunate prince, Charles IV. who he gained considerable honours in the field; but who was weak, inconstant, and imprudent; had enter into a treaty, by which he gave up Lorrain, ast his death, to the crown of France; upon cond tion, that the king should permit him to raise million upon the territories which he thus aba doned to him; and that the princes of the blood Lorrain should be reputed princes of the blood France. This treaty, which in vain had the a probation of the parliament of Paris, only prove

Chober 27. 1662. d 1663. August 30. 1669

We

T a B d

mo

lood avin

Eng

3700 k up

lan

cit

onta

a te

1 fd

Maria

o ha

t wh

ntere

, aft

cond

raise

s aba

ood

ood

ne ap

prove

. 166

th

ne cause of fresh inconstancy in the duke of Lorin; who was afterwards glad to give up Marsal, and submit himself intirely to the king's cleency.

Lewis augmented his dominions, even during the eace; and kept himself always ready for war, by forfying his frontiers, disciplining his troops, increase g their number, and frequently reviewing them.

The Turks were, at that time, very formidable Europe; and had attacked the Emperor and the enetians together. Since the reign of Francis I. has always been the policy of the kings of France be in alliance with the Turks, both for the fake commerce, and to restrain the power of the house Austria: nevertheless, a Christian king ought to lift the emperor, when he is in great danger: and, deed, it is the interest of France, that the Turks ould invade Hungary; but not that they should bdue it. And besides, France, by its treaties ith the Empire, was obliged, in honour, to grant affistance, when it became necessary. crefore fent fix thousand men into Hungary, under e command of Coligny, the only person remaing of the house of Coligny, formerly so celebrated our civil wars, and who, perhaps, by his courage d virtue, merited as high renown as the celeated admiral of his name. He had been attached the great Condé, through friendship; and all e offers of cardinal Mazarin could never make m abandon this attachment. He took with him e flower of the French nobility, and, among hers, the young la Feuillade, a man who had an terprising genius, and a great desire of eminence dglory. f This body of French troops marched to Hungary, to serve under Montecuculi, who, that time, opposed the grand visier Kiuperli, f August 1664.

and, who afterwards ferving against France, by lanced the reputation even of Turenne. Age battle was fought at Saint Gothard, upon the bai of the Raab, between the emperor's forces and Turks; and the French, upon this occasion, po formed prodigies of valour; infomuch that t Germansthemselves, who did not like them, con not refuse to do them justice: but it would not doing justice to the Germans, to affirm, as has be done in so many books, that the honour of the tory ought to be ascribed to the French alone.

The king, at the fame time that he employ his power in openly fuccouring the emperor, a increasing the reputation of his arms, also emplo ed his policy in secretly supporting Portugal again Spain. Mazarin had formally abandoned the h tuguese, by the Pyrenean treaty; in which sever little tacit infractions had been made by the Sp niards. But the French made one that wash bold and decifive: the marshal de Schomberg, w was a foreigner, and a Huguenot, went into Pa ivid tugal with four thousand French troops, whom wild paid with the money of Lewis XIV. thought and in pretended to maintain them in the name of t independent of the pretended to maintain them in the name of t independent of the pretended to maintain them in the name of the independent of the pretended to maintain them in the name of the independent of the indepe king of Portugal. These four thousand from lower troops, being joined to the Portuguese forces, a which tained a complete victory at Villa Viciosa; which is tained a complete victory at Villa Viciosa; which is thus Lewis XIV. already made himself regard which as a martial and political prince; and he will allow dreaded in Europe, even before he had actual which made war made war.

It was this policy which, in spite of his public range mises, made him avoid joining the sew ships france then had to the sleets of Holland. He had entered by into an alliance with the Dutch in 1662. The 1665 republic, about that time, renewed the war again

England

h.

ngl

dict

d

ew

we

her

ar,

oft

uit

erti

ree

uyt

aval

arni

wn

lf.

n t

lwa

s ye

T

ment

6 ba great and de per de contract de contr

oth

bee via

again igland

ngland; the cause of which was the vain and liculous competition for the honour of the flag, d their rights to the commerce of the Indies. ewis, with pleasure, beheld these two maritime owers annually fending out fleets against each her, composed of more than an hundred men of ar, and mutually destroying one another, by the oft obstinate combats that were ever seen; all the uit of which was only the weakening of both arties. One of these engagements lasted during ree intire days g. It was in these encounters that nyter gained the reputation of being the greatest aval commander that ever lived. It was he who arm the finest of the English ships, even in their aval commander that ever fived. It was he who are until the finest of the English ships, even in their with ports, and within four leagues of London items of the lift. He, in short, rendered Holland triumphar to the lift. He, in short, rendered Holland triumphar to the lift. He, in short, rendered Holland triumphar to the lift. He, in short, rendered Holland triumphar to the lift. He, in short, and whereon Lewis XIV. was, shown as yet, of no consequence.

The sovereignty of the seas was, for some time, and in war, was well known only by them. France, and in war, was well known only by them. France, and in war, was well known only by them. France, and in war, was well known only by them. France, and in war, was well known only by them. France, of the mainstry of Richelieu, thought herself from lowerful at sea, because, out of about fixty vessels, which she computed in her ports, she could put to white a about thirty; of which only one carried seventy and uns. Under Mazarin, the sew ships we had were gard witched of the Dutch. We were in want of officers, which is necessary in the construction and equipment of shipping. The king undertook to repair is problem. The king undertook to repair is problem. The king undertook to repair is problem. The king undertook to repair the ruinous condition of his maxine, and to supply instance with every thing of this kind which it wanteness the with incredible diligence. Yet, in 1664. and the last of the last of

F June 11. 12. 13. 1666.

to ve ag

be

ch

th

W

ol

hi

W

Ca

lo N

W

cr

C

S

Vi

re

p.

1

Ch.

Lewis had not then more than fifteen or fixteen the lowest rates, which the duke of Beaufort conmanded against the Barbary corsairs; and, who the states general pressed him to join his sleet with theirs, there was only a single fire-ship in the prof Brest, which it was shameful to send out, a which, nevertheless, at the repeated solicitations the Dutch, was sent to them. But Lewis XIV used his utmost efforts to efface the shame of this the most sudden and effectual manner.

He succoured the states more essentially a honourably with his land-forces. He fent the fix thousand men, to defend them against the bishop of Munster, a warlike prelate, and the implacable enemy, who was gained by En land, to attack and ravage the territories of But Lewis made them pay dear for is affiftance, and treated them like a powerful perfor who fells his protection to opulent merchants. Col bert placed to their account not only the pay of these troops, but even charged them with the or pences of an embassy sent into England, to nego tiate their peace with Charles II. Succours was never given with fo ill a grace, nor received les gratefully.

The king, having thus rendered his troops reterans, formed new generals in Hungary, Holland, and Portugal; and, having obtained fatis faction and respect in Rome, he no longer behelf a single potentate whom he had any reason to fear The devastation made in England by the plague the burning of London, of which the Catholic were unjustly accused, and the continual prodigibility and indigence of Charles II. which were a destructive to his affairs as the contagion, or the fare, placed France in perfect security, with regard

h. 6

end

COM.

Who

, 2

ns a

hisi

then

the their

Eng.

r bi

Col

ay of

e ex-

nego

Wer

I lef

S TE-

Hol

fatis

eheld

fear

ague

diga-

re as

egan

10 to the English. The emperor had not yet recovered that strength, which he had lost in his war against the Turks: and Philip IV. king of Spain, being in a languishing state of body, and his monarchy being as feeble as himself, Lewis XIV. was the only great and formidable monarch: and he was young, rich, perfectly well served, implicitly obeyed, and shewed an impatience to signalize himself, and become a conqueror.

CHAPTER VII.

The Conquest of Flanders.

OPPORTUNITY foon presented itself to I a king who anxiously sought for it. His father-in-law Philip IV. died. By his first wife, who was the fifter of Lewis XIII. he had had the princess Maria-Theresa, who was married to Lewis XIV. by which marriage the Spanish monarchy at last came into the house of Bourbon, which had so long been its enemy. By his fecond marriage with Mary-Anne of Austria, he had had Charles II. a weak and unhealthy child, who was the heir to his crown, and the only one remaining of three male children, of which two had died in their infancy. Lewis XIV. pretended, that Flanders and Franche-Comté, which were provinces of the kingdom of Spain, ought, according to the laws of these provinces, to revert to his wife, notwithstanding her renunciation. Were the causes of kings determined by the laws of nations before an impartial tribunal, the affair might have been doubtful.

Lewis directed his pretentions to be examined by his council, and by the doctors in theology, by whom they were declared incontestable; but they were pronounced quite the contrary by the council

and

d

di

th

di

ei

25

V

fe

0

CI

h

V

ti

r

n

h

V

T:

m

Je

and confessor of Philip the fourth's widow. She had one very strong argument in her favour, which was an express law of Charles V. but very little regard was paid to the laws of Charles V. by the court of France.

One of the pretexts which were alledged by the king's council, was, that the five hundred thousand crowns, granted as a dowry with his wife, had never been paid: but they forgot, that the dowry of Henry the fourth's daughter remained still unpaid as well as this. The altercations between France and Spain were commenced in writings, wherein the calculations of a banker, and the arguments of a lawyer, were amply displayed; but reasons of state were the only reasons to which any regard was paid.

The king, depending more upon his forces than his arguments, marched into Flanders, to the acquisition of undoubted conquests. He was himself at the head of thirty-five thousand men; another body of eight thousand was sent towards Dunkirk, and another of four thousand towards Luxembourg. Turenne, under him, was the general of his army. Colbert had multiplied the resources necessary to defray the expence of these troops. Louvois, the newminister for military affairs, had made immense preparations for the campaign. He distributed magazines of all kinds upon the frontiers, and was the first who introduced that advantageous method, which the weakness of the government had before rendered impracticable, of subsisting the armies by means of magazines. Whatever siege the king undertook, or on whatever fide he turned his arms, fuccours and subsistence were always ready, the quarters for the troops marked out, and their marches regulated. Discipline, which, by the inflexible aufterity of the fovereign, was rendered daily he

ich

tle

the

the

and

ne.

of

aid

ace

ein

of

of

was

nac

ui-

fat

vbo

and

rg.

ny.

de-

the

nse

ted

Was

od,

ore

by

ing

his

idy,

neir

in-

red

aily

daily more severe, kept all the officers to their duty: and the presence of a young king, who was the idol of his army, rendered the strictness of this duty not only easy, but delightful. The military employment began, from that time, to be considered as an honour much superior to that of birth. Services, and not families, were regarded; which had seldom been observed before. By this means, an officer, though of very inconsiderable birth, was encouraged; and, at the same time, those of the highest rank had no cause to complain. The infantry, upon which, since the disuse of lances, the whole weight of the war had fallen, participated in the advantages enjoyed by the cavalry: and the troops, in general, were inspired with new courage by the new maxims in the government.

The king being possessed of a minister, and a general, whose abilities were equally great; who were both jealous of each other, and who, for that reason, served him the better; having also an army composed of the best troops in Europe, and having entered into an alliance with Portugal; he, with all these advantages, attacked a province, which was but weakly defended, of a kingdom that was depopulated and ruined. He had only his mother-in-law to oppose; and she was a weak woman, whose unhappy government had rendered the Spanish monarchy defenceless. Philip the fourth's widow had made her confessor, who was a German Jesuit, named Father Nitard her prime minister. He was as capable to govern the will of his penitent, as he was incapable to govern the state; having none of the qualities of a minister, or a priest, except pride and ambition. He had the boldness one day to tell the duke of Lerma, even before he held the reins of government, that he ought to respect him, for that he had his God in his hands, and his queen at his feet, every day. With this haughtines,

Ch ab. he

rer

up

who

ma

tigu

of dev

Th

grea

in a

con

his

vou

ther

tary

nog

tran

one

vent

fecu

king

the 1

prec

men

you

tho? be n

1

Ch. 7

which is so opposite to a truly great genius, he suf. fered the treasury to be without money, the fortifications throughout the kingdom to fall into ruin and the ports to be without ships. The troops beffi also were without discipline, destitute of officers, he ill-paid, and still worse commanded: and these me troops were to oppose an enemy, which enjoyed Terv mai of.

The art of attacking towns, as it is now prac. tised, was not then brought to perfection, because the art of fortifying and defending them was not fo well understood as it is now. The frontiers of Spanish Flanders were almost without fortifications all the advantages Spain wanted.

or garifons.

Lewis had only to present himself before them: he entered Charleroi as he would have entered Paris: Ath and Tournay were taken in two days; nor did Furnes, Armentieres, or Courtrai, hold out longer2. He appeared in the trenches before Douaib, and it surrendered the next day. Liste, the most flourishing city in all this country, the only one that was well fortified, and which had a garifon of fix thousand men, capitulated after nine days siege. The Spaniards had only eight thousand men to opose the victorious troops; and the rear of this little army was attacked and cut in pieces by the marquis, afterwards the marshal de Crequit; and the remainder fled under the walls of Mons and Brussels, leaving the king a conqueror without fighting.

This campaign being made in the midst of the greatest plenty of every thing, and its success being so sudden, and so easy, it appeared rather like a tour made by the court for their diversion : and pleasures of every hind, and all the luxury of the table,

e August 27. 2 July 6. 1667. August 27. d August 31.

fuf.

orti-

ruin.

oops

cers,

thefe

oyed

orac.

ause

not

s of

tions

m:

Pa-

ays;

hold

fore

flee,

only

ifon

days

men

ar of

by

nid;

and

hout

the

s be-

like

and

the 27.

ble,

able, were then introduced into our armies, even at he very time when discipline was improving. The officers did their duty much more exactly, but heir conveniencies were much greater than for-Marshal Turenne, for a long time, was merly. ferved in the field only upon plates of iron. The marshal d' Humieres was the first, who, at the siege of Arras, in 1658. was ferved in filver in the renches, and had ragouts and entremets ferved up to his table. But, in this campaign of 1667. wherein a young king, who loved grandeur and magnificence, displayed that of his court in the fatigues of war, every one was emulous, in imitation of the royal example, to fhew his tafte and grandeur, in his table, his dresses, and his equipages. This luxury, which is a certain fign of riches in a great kingdom, and is frequently the cause of ruin in a little state, was nevertheless but inconsiderable, compared to what we have feen fince. The king, his generals, and his ministers, went to the rendezyous of the army on horseback; whereas, now, there is not even a captain of horse, nor the secretary of a general officer, who does not go in his post-chaise, more commodiously, and in greater tranquillity, than in making a visit formerly from one part of Paris to another.

The delicacy of the officers did not then prevent them from appearing in the trenches with the fecurity of the helmet and cuirass: of which the king himself gave an example, by going thus into the trenches before Douai and Lisle. This prudent precaution has preserved the lives of many great men. But it has since been too much neglected by young men, who are not over-robust, and who, tho' effeminate, are full of courage, and seem to be more afraid of fatigue than danger.

Ch

Th

veri

holo

om n t amr

enc

into

ally

The

in,

conj

real

gula

crec

in t

the

ing

lon cour

He ·

arri

lect

the

fron

Con

frier duke atta (emb

The rapidity of these conquests filled Brussel with alarms; and the citizens began to remove their effects to Antwerp. The conquest of a Flanders might have been the work of a fingle campaign. The king only wanted a sufficient num. ber c troops to garifon the towns which were every-where ready to furrender to his arms. Low vois advised his majesty to put strong garisons in the towns already taken, and to fortify them, Vauban, one of those great men, and great genius's which appeared in this age for the service of Lewi XIV. was directed to construct these fortifications which he did according to his own new method which is now become a rule to all our good engineers. People were aftonished to behold towns for rounded by works, which were almost even with the High and menacing fortification open country. were only fo much the more exposed to destruction from the artillery; and the more he made them level the less liable they were to be destroyed or taken He constructed the citadel of Lisle upon these prin ciples. In France, the government of a city ha never yet been separated from that of the fortress but an example of this was now given in favour Vauban, who was the first governor of a citadel We may farther observe here, that the first pland fortification after this method, which is to be feet in the gallery of the Louvre, was for the fortifica tions of Lisle.

The king hasten'd to return, and receive the ac clamations of his people, the adorations of his courtiers, and mistresses, and to partake in the plea fure of those entertainments which he gave to hi court.

9701

ngle

um.

Were 011-

Si

iem.

us's

ewis

ions:

thod

engi.

s fur-

h the

tions

Ction

level

aken

prin y had

tres

our a

tadel

e seet tifica

he ac

of hi

CHAPTER VIII.

The conquest of Franche-Comté; and the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle.

THE court was intirely engaged in diversions, when, in the month of January a, and the feverity of winter, the world was aftonished to behold troops marching on all fides, fome one way, ome another, through the roads of Champagne, in the three bishopricks. Trains of artillery and ammunition-waggons appeared, under divers preences, in the roads which lead from Champagne into Burgundy. This part of France was univerally in motion, yet the cause intirely unknown. The neighbouring nations, as being interested therein, and the court, through curiofity, formed various conjectures upon it: Germany was alarmed; but the real motive to all these preparations, and these irregular marches, was unknown to all the world. Secrecy in a conspiracy was never better observed than in this enterprize of Lewis XIV. who, at last, on the second of February, quitted St. Germains, belano ing accompanied by the young duke d'Enguien, fon of the great Gondé, and some others of his court; the rest of the officers being with the troops. He went on horseback, and, in a very short time, arrived at Dijon: and twenty thousand men, collected from twenty different places, appeared at ples the same time in Franche-Comté, a few leagues to his from Befançon, having at their head the great Condé, whose principal lieutenant-general was his friend Bouteville-Montmorency, who was become dake of Luxembourg, and who had always been HAF attached to him in his good and bad fortune. Luxembourg had been instructed in the art of war under a 1668.

Ch. 8

Ch.

y P

ubje

S

nd

bbé

avi

had,

Spa

fort

war

the

Th

alfo

aft

thei con

no

twe

of t

Cor

and

Th

ren

fhro

city

diff

Vois

dire

thef

king

tune

F

Was

cou

nef

hate

His

and

Condé; and, by force of merit, he obliged the king to employ him, though he did not love him.

The true motives to this sudden and unexpected enterprize were these: the prince of Condé was jealous of the glory of Turenner, and Louvois of his savour with the king: Condé's jealous was that of an hero, and Louvois that of a minister. The prince, being governor of Burgundy, which joins to Franche-Comté, formed the design to make himself master of that province in the winter, is less time than Turenne the summer before had conquered French Flanders. He immediately communicated his design to Louvois, who entered into it with eagerness, in order to render Turenne mnecessary, and, at the same time, to serve his master.

This province, which was then poor enough with regard to money, but was exceeding fruitful and populous, forty leagues in length, and twenty in breadth, was not only called Franche, or free, but really was fo. The kings of Spain were rather is protectors than its masters. And tho' the province belonged to the government of Flanders, it depended but very little upon it. The whole administration was divided and disputed between the parliament and the governor of Franche-Comte. The people enjoyed great privileges, and were always respected by the court of Madrid, which paid a deference to a province jealous of its rights, and in the neighbourhood of France. No people ever lived under a more gentle government; nor was any people ever more strongly attached to its fovereigns. Their love for the house of Austria continued even for two generations; though this might rather be called the love of their liberties.

In short, Franche-Comté, tho' poor, was happy; and as it was a kind of republic, it was not without factions; and, notwithstanding what is said

J

y Pelisson, force was not the only means used to ubject this province.

8

ing

Was

s of that

The

oins

ake , in

had

om-

00-

his

ough

itful

enty

, but

er its

vince

end-

iftra-

arlia-

The

ways

a de-

nd in

ever

was

s for

ustria

n this

es.

hap.

as no

is faid

by

Some of the principal inhabitants, by promifes nd presents, were gained at first; particularly, the bbé John de Batteville, the brother of him, who, naving insulted the French embassador at London, had, by that outrage, caused the humiliation of the Spanish-Austrian branch. This abbé, who had formerly been an officer, then a Carthusian, afterwards a Turk, and at last an ecclesiastic, had the promise of grand dean, and other benefices. The governor's nephew, count de St. Amour, was also corrupted; nor did the governor himself at aft prove inflexible. Some of the counsellors of their parliament were likewise purchased at no very considerable expence. These secret intrigues were no fooner commenced than they were supported by twenty thousand men; and Besançon, the capital of the province, was invested by the prince of Condé. Luxembourg appeared also before Salins; and the next day both these places surrendered. The only article of capitulation defired for the furrender of Besancon, was the preservation of an holy shrowd, which was very highly revered in that city: and this request was granted them without difficulty. The king arrived at Dijon; and Louvois, who had secretly repaired to the frontiers, to direct all these marches, came to inform him, that these two places had been besieged and taken. The king immediately hastened to appear, where fortune did every thing in his favour.

He marched in person to besiege Dole, which was reputed strong, and was commanded by the count de Montrevel, who, through a certain greatness of soul, was faithful to the Spaniards, whom he hated; and to the parliament, which he despised. His garison consisted only of sour hundred soldiers and citizens; and he nevertheless dared to make a defence.

fence. The trenches, which were not carried on in form, were scarce opened when a croud of young volunteers, who had followed the king, ran to at tack the counterfearp, wherein they made a lodg. The prince of Condé, whose courage wa rendered calm and unruffled by age and experience fupported them properly, and joined them in their danger, to extricate them out of it. The prince wa present in all places, accompanied by his son; and afterwards came to give an account of every thing to the king, as though he had been an officer who had his fortune to make. The king, in his quar. ters, rather shewed the dignity of a monarch in his court, than any impetuous ardour, which was then not necessary. All the ceremonial of St. Germains was observed. He had an apartment for his repose, his great officers to wait upon him, courses regularly served to his table and a drawing. room, all within his tent: nor was the dignity of the throne in any thing laid aside, except in having his general officers and aids-de-camp dine at his table. He, in the toils of war, did not shew the impetuous courage of Francis I. and Henry IV. who fought all the various species of danger. He was fatisfied in not fearing them himfelf, and in engaging all others to precipitate themselves therein, with ardour, to ferve him. He entered Dole at the end of four days siege, and twelve days after his departure from St. Germains: and, in short, in less than three weeks all Franche-Comté was subjected to him. The council of Spain, being aftonished and incensed at the little resistance that was made, wrote to the governor; " That the " king of France, instead of going in person, " might as well have fent his laqueys to take pol-" fession of the province."

b February 14, 1668.

Suc

usec

egan

ear i ours

eir l

land

nd th

onfec

read

pain

nd v

hich

ac

Ho

t the

ensic

y as he fr

nly o

ccasi

Hagu

ame

al mo

newe

ne m itizer

terw

He

mon

de Er

ras a ire.

theisr

de ge

h. 8. Such good fortune, and fuch great ambition, used Europe from its lethargy. The emperor gan to raise troops, and the Empire itself to apear in motion. The Switzers, who are the neighours of Franche-Comté, and whose sole good is eir liberty, began to tremble for it. The rest of anders was liable to be invaded the enfuing fpring: nd the Dutch, to whom it had always appeared of onsequence to have the French for their friends, readed the having them for their neighbours. pain now had recourse to these very Hollanders, and was, in fact, protected by this little nation, hich before it had only despised, and considered a country of rebels. Holland was governed by John de Witt, who, the age of twenty-five, had been elected grand ensionary. He regarded the liberties of his coun-y as much as his personal grandeur: agreeable to ne frugality and modesty of his republic, he had nly one man and one maid-servant, and, upon all ccasions, walked on foot through the streets of the lague, while, in the negotiations of Europe, his ame was number'd with those of the most power-Il monarchs: he was indefatigable in business, and bewed great order, prudence, and application, in here he management of affairs; yet, tho' an excellent itizen, and a great politician, he was nevertheless days fierwards very unfortunate.

d, in He contracted a friendship, which is uncommon omté mong ministers of state, with Sir William Temple, , be- te English embassador at the Hague. Temple as a philosopher, who united business with literaat the are. Tho' bishop Burnet has reproached him with rson, theism, he was a very good man, was born with post-ne genius of a wise republican, loved Holland as is own country, because it was free, and was as alous of its liberties as the grand pensionary himf. These two statesmen united with the count

Such

tance

nd ng

ho ar-

in Was St.

for

im, ng.

the his ble. pe-

who He

S C

en

ars

nd

edi

T

ms

ine

cal

anc

y,

op

ve

hir

ng

hat .

an

e cor

e kir

he !

eafec

rerec

the

fficie

omté tepin

nts o

its c

de Dhona, the embassador of Sweden, in ordern stop the progress of the king of France.

The rapidity of the events which happened about this period, is what chiefly distinguishes it. Flanders, which we call French Flanders, had been used the in three months. Franche-Comté in three weeks, and the treaty between Holland, England and Sweden, to preserve the balance of Europe, and put a stop to the ambition of Lewis XIV. was proposed and concluded in five days.

Lewis XIV. was filled with indignation, to be hold such a little state as Holland forming design to set bounds to his conquests, and be the arbitero kings; and his indignation was increased, when he found, that this little state was able to do this Such an enterprize of the United provinces was a outrage he could not bear, tho' he affected to differ regard it; and, from that time, he meditate revenge.

Notwithstanding his ambition, his power, and his rage, he dissipated the storm which seemed to be rising in all parts of Europe, by proposing a pear himself. France and Spain fixed upon Aix-la-Chapelle, as the place to hold the conferences; and, so mediator, chose the new pope, Rospigliosi, who was named Clement IX.

The court of Rome, to conceal its real weakned under an appearance of credit, sought, by all man ner of means, to be the arbiter of Europe; in which design it had not been able to succeed in the Pyronean treaty: but it at least appeared to have gained this in the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. A nuncious was sent to the congress, to be the shadow of a arbiter between the shadows of plenipotentiaries. The Hollanders, who had long been jealous of their glory, refused to divide the honour of concluding what they had commenced. All the negotiations were really carried on at St. Germains, by

mean Vol

ert ans of their embassador Van-Beunning. What characteristics of their embassador Van-Beunning. What as privately granted by him, was sent to Aixbon Chapelle, to be signed in form by the ministers sembled at the congress. Who would, thirty are before, have imagined, that a citizen of Holthre and should force France and Spain to receive his ediation?

This Van-Beunning, who was a burgomaster of msterdam, had the vivacity of a Frenchman, ined to the pride of a Spaniard. He, upon every casion, took a pleasure in shocking the imperious andeur of the king; and, to the tone of superiotero y, which the ministers of France began to assume, en he opposed republican inflexibility. Will you not bethis we what the king says? said Monsieur de Lienne him, in a conference. I don't know what the him, in a conference. I don't know what the odd no will do, replied Van-Beunning; but I know hat he can do. In short, a peace was concluded, an authoritative manner, by a burgonance, and a court of the most superb of monarchs: by which to be king was forced to restore Franche-Com: é. peac he Hollanders would have been much better Cha leased, if he had restored Flanders, and so have ded, for sered them from fo formidable a neighbour. But the nations of Europe thought the king shewed ficient moderation in relinquishing Franches ficient moderation, in relinquishing Francheomté. He, in the mean time, gained more by man steping the towns of Flanders; and he opened the which this of Holland, whose destruction he meditated Pyro the very time when he seemed to comply with raine its demands.

f May 2. 1668.

G

knel

which

unci of at

iaries us o f con nego ns, b

CHAPTER IX.

The magnificence of Lewis XIV. The co quest of Holland.

EWIS XIV. compelled, for some time, remain in peace, continued, as he had beg to regulate, to fortify, and adorn his kingdom He shewed, that an absolute monarch, who is we disposed, may affect every thing. He had on to command, and success in the administration w as rapid as his conquests had been. It was real wonderful to behold the sea-ports, which belo were deferted and in ruins, now furrounded works which were at once both their ornamenta their defence; covered also with ships and marine and containing already near fixty large men of w New colonies, under the protection of his fa were fent from all parts into America, the Eastdies, and to the coasts of Africa. In the meanting many thousand men were employed in France, der his immediate inspection, in the construction of immense Edifices, and in the exercise of those arts which architecture introduces. And, the interior of his court and capital, the not and more ingenious arts acquired France that gl and elegance, of which the preceding ages not even the idea. Literature flourished. I barbarity of the schools was corrected by go sense and good taste. But a full account of glory and happiness of the nation shall be given its proper place in this history : here we shall sp only of general or military affairs.

Portugal, about this time, exhibited an extra dinary scene to Europe. Don Alphonso, who an unworthy fon of the happy Don John of B

th

n W

ed

vin

rit

his

ed

me

ling

tha

less

y c

in nge

in fran

his

g 0

ristin

of g

quil

of S

Wh

the

o for

learn ore h

h ro

live !

e, t

egu

We

d on

w a

real

befo

ded

ent a

rine

of w

is fla

aft-I

an tin

ce, u tructi

of

And,

nob

at glo

ages !

d. T

by go

nt of

given all spe

extra

who i

gar

12a, reigned over that kingdom. He was fuus and impotent. His wife, who was a daughter the duke de Nemours, being in love with Don dro, Alphonfo's brother, she formed a design dethrone her husband, and espouse her lover. r husband's barbarity justified the audaciousness this attempt. His strength of body was more n common. He had publicly kept a mistres, whom he had had a child, which he acknowed: and he had long cohabited with the queen. e, nevertheless, accused him of impotence; and ing, by her prudent conduct, obtained that aurity in the kingdom which her husband had lost his furious behaviour, she caused him to be coned; after which she soon obtained a bull from me to espouse her brother-in-law. It is not surfing, that Rome should grant this bull; but it is that those who were all-powerful should, neverless, have occasion for it. This event, which y caused a revolution in the royal family, and in the kingdom of Portugal, producing no nge in the affairs of Europe, deserves our noin this place only for its fingularity.

france, soon after, received a king, who quithisthrone in a different manner. John Casimir, g of Poland, renewed the example of queen ristina. Wearied by the fatigues and perplexitof government, and desirous to live in a happy quillity, he chose a retreat at Paris, in the about St. Germains, of which he was abbot. Pawhich, for some years, had been the seat of the arts, was a delightful residence to a king, o sought the sweets of society, and was a lover learning. He had been a Jesuit, and a cardinal, ore he was a king; and, being equally disgusted h royalty and the church, he now sought only live in a philosophical retirement, and would

* September 1668.

Be

mi

enc ro

La me

SI

ug C.

h.

and

ly d t

ke

laf

as r

Th

rio

e m

tbe

bey

each

ge c

rit

aqu

ge,

paqu

ome

hich

e er

ty of

Th

ant r

nest (

never permit the title of majesty to be given at Paris.

But a more interesting affair, at this time, or manded the attention of all the Christian princes

The Turks, less formidable indeed than un the Mahomets, the Selims, and the Solimans, still dangerous and formidable through our fions, had, for two Years, befieged Candy all the forces of their empire. And it appear doubtful, upon this occasion, which to adm most; the long and vigorous defence madeby Venetians, or their being abandoned by thed potentates of Europe.

The times were greatly changed. When Christ dom was in a state of barbarity, a pope, ore a monk, could engage millions of Christians to and combat the Mahometans in their own empire and the nations of Europe were exhausted both men and money, for the conquest of the wrete and barren province of Judæa: but now, thou the ifle of Candy, which was reputed the wark of Christendom against the Infidels, overpowered by fixty thousand Turks; yet powers of Europe regarded the loss with difference. The gallies of Malta, and a few the pope's, were the only force which defend this republic against the Ottoman empire. I senate of Venice, whose impotence was as great its wisdom, was unable, with mercenary troo and fuch weak affidance, to relift the grand it Kinperli, who was a good minister, and a be general; was master of the Turkish empire, the head of formidable forces; and even had go engineers.

The king, in vain, fet the other powers of rope an example for the relief of Candy. His lies, and the new thips which he had just b in the port of Toulon, failed thither with fe

thoul

Ch. 9. usand men, under the command of the duke

ren

, 00

DCes

ו נום ns,

ur d

y v

ppea

adm

by ne of

hrifte

or er

is to

mpi

both

retd thou

he b

5,

yet ! ith

few

efend

. T

troo

nd ri

a bet pire,

ad go

sof Hisg

aft b

b fet

thoul

commence

minent a danger, because this generosity of the ach was not imitated by any other nation in rope. La Feuillade, a private gentleman of France, per-

Beaufort; but this succour was insufficient in so med an action upon this occasion, of which there s no example but in the times of chivalry. hught near three hundred gentlemen to the relief Candy, at his own expence, tho' he was not h. Had any other nation of Europe given a ply equal to this fent by Feuil'ade, it is probable andy would have been faved. But this fuccour ly served to retard the taking of it some days, d to be the cause of unnecessary bloodshed. The ke of Beaufort was flain in a fally; and Kiuperli last, by capitulation, entered the place, which snow no better than an heap of ruins.

The Turks, in this siege, shewed themselves sufor to the Christians, even in the knowlege of emilitary art. The largest cannons, which had tbeen seen in Europe, were cast in their camp. key, for the first time, drew parallel lines in the oches; and we are obliged to them for the knowge of this; but they were themselves indebted ritto an Italian engineer. It is certain, that fuch inquerors as the Turks, who had experience, couge, riches, and that constancy in fatigues, which is then their distinguished character, might have oquered Italy, and made themselves masters of ome in a very short time. But the weak emperors hich they had afterwards, their bad generals, and error of their government, have been the fecuty of Christendom.

The king, being but little affected by these diant revolutions, matured his great design of a conbest of the Low Countries, which he intended to September 16. 1669.

ortuni im republi ritho

arte

har

T

A

leni

vith

nto

nine

Dunl

he a

fth

y th

ined

oun

nd o

vith

nd :

hons

lated

repa

oun

nter

T

ions

of his

ibera

pon

of sp

etta (

was a

ing fe

mone

defire

inthe

commence by that of Holland. The opportuni grew daily more favourable. This little repul ruled upon the feas; but nothing could be weak by land. Being allied with Spain and England, a in peace with France, she reposed too great a co fidence in the fecurity of treaties, and the adva tages of an immense commerce: in proportion her naval armaments became disciplined and i vincible, her land-forces were poor and contempt ble. Their cavalry was composed only of citizen who never quitted their houses, and paid me which they got out of the dregs of the people, do the duty for them. The infantry was near upon the same footing. The officers, and event governors of the fortified towns, were either boy or the relations of burgomasters, brought up in i activity and inexperience, and regarding their po in the same light in which priests regard their ben The pensioner John de Witt used his ende vours to correct these abuses: but he did not !

The first thing necessary to be done, was to detach England from its alliance with Holland. To United provinces being once deprived of this support, their destruction appeared inevitable. Lew XIV. did not find it difficult to engage Charles I in his designs. The English king had not, indee shewn himself very sensible of the dishonour which his reign and nation had received, in the burning of his ships, even in the Thames, by the Dute sheet. He breathed neither revenge nor conquests his passion was rather to enjoy his pleasures, at reign with a power less constrained: and to flatte this disposition, therefore, was the most effectually way to seduce him. Lewis, who, to have me ney, then needed only to speak, promised a green with fufficient vigour and refolution; which w one of the great faults of this republican.

m to king Charles, who could never get any ithout the consent of his parliament. The secret eaty, concluded between the two kings, was imarted, in France, only to Madame, the fifter of harles II. and wife of Monfieur, the king's brother, Turenne, and to Louvois.

ubl

eak condva

n

di

mpt

zen

mer

e,

near en t boy

n i pol

ben ende

ot a h w

to d

s fu

Lew

es II ndee which

Dute

uelts

, an

flatt

fectu

e mo

gre fun

A prince s, of twenty-fix years of age, was the lenipotentiary for the conclusion of this treaty with king Charles. The pretence for her going nto England was a tour, which the king deternined to make, in his new conquests, towards Dunkirk and Lise. The pomp and grandeur of he antient kings of Asia did not equal the splender of this tour: the king was preceded, or followed, y thirty thousand men, some of which were defined to reinforce the garifons in the conquered ountries, others to work upon the fortifications, nd others to mark out the roads. The king took with him the queen his wife, and all the princesses, and most beautiful ladies in his court. Madame hone in the midst of them; and her heart was lated with the pleasure, and the glory, of all this reparation, which was made only upon her acount. The journey appeared to be one continued intertainment, from Saint Germains to Lisle.

The king, who was desirous to gain the affecions of his new subjects, and deceive the attention of his neighbours, was every-where profuse in his iberalities; and gold and diamonds were lavished urnir pon all, who had the least pretence to the honour of speaking to the monarch. The princess Henritta embarked at Calais, to see her brother, who was at Canterbury to receive her: and Charles, being seduced by his friendship for his sister, and the money of France, figned every thing Lewis XIV. desired; and prepared the destruction of Holland, in the midst of pleasures and diversions.

ith he do journel of the document of the docum fifed

Ch. 9

nong on t etend justi e en ho ha

The the em,

g we d fair d wh Tha requall the atch san-Be me w evaile en giv

ords:
eunnin
ith a f
t fol:

is me deed, idexp

The lofs of Madame, who died fuddenly, a in an extraordinary manner, foon after her return raised some suspicions prejudicial to Monsieur; b they caused no change in the resolutions of the tw The spoils of the republic, which wast be destroyed, were already divided, by the fem treaty, between the courts of France and England in the same manner as Flanders had been divide with the Dutch in 1635. Thus projects, allies, an enemies, are perpetually changing, and great defign are frequently rendered vain and delusive. An mour of the approaching enterprize began to b spread; but Europe listened to it in silence. The emperor being engaged in the feditions of Hung ry, Sweden immersed in negociations, and Spi being always weak, irresolute, and slow; and and unlimited career was given to the ambition Lewis XIV.

Holland, to complete its misfortune, was divided into two factions; one, of rigid republicans, whom the least snadow of despotic power appears a monster, contrary to the laws of humanity: the other, of moderate republicans, who were for the instating, in the posts of his ancestors, the your prince of Orange, who became afterwards so celebrated under the name of William the Third. The grand pensionary John de Witt, and Cornelius he brother, were at the head of the rigid partisans liberty; but the party of the young prince began prevail: and the republic, being thus more engaged its domestic dissensions, than attentive to its dange contributed to its own ruin.

Lewis not only purchased the king of England but also gained the elector of Gologne, and Valuation, that bishop of Munster, who thirsted fewers, was greedy of spoils, and was naturally enemy to the Hollanders. Lewis had former assistance.

, an etum

; bu

e tw

fect

gland ivide

s, an elign

An

to b

Th

Iunga

Spai

a fic tion o

livide

ans,

peare

7 : th

for 10

your

o cel

lius h

fans

egan

aged lange

nglan

Va

ed f

ally

rmer assist

isted them against this bishop; but now he united th him, for their destruction. Sweden, which djoined the Dutch in 1668, to put a stop to proesses which did not concern her, now, when they vast are menaced with ruin, abandoned them; and newed her antient alliance with France, in coneration of the usual subsidies.

It is fingular, and deferves to be remarked, that nong all the enemies, which were going to fall on this little state, there was not one who had any etence for a war. The enterprize might, indeed, juftly compared to the league between Lewis XII. e emperor Maximilian, and the king of Spain, ho had formerly planned the destruction of the Vetian republic; because it was rich and proud.

The states - general, in a great consternation, wrote the king, humbly intreating his majesty to tell em, whether the great preparations he was makg were really destined against them, his antient dfaithful allies? wherein they had offended him? d what reparation he expected? He replied, That he should employ his troops in such a manner as his dignity might demand, which did not require him to give an account of it to any one." the reason given by his minister was, that the utch gazette had been too insolent; and because an-Beunning was faid to have struck a medal, inious to Lewis XIV. Van-Beunning's christened me was Joshua. A taste for mottos and devices trailed at that time in France. The fun had tn given as a device to Lewis XIV. with these ords: Nec pluribus impar. It was said, that Vansunning had caused himself to be represented, ith a sun, and these words: In conspectu meo stesol: The sun stood still at my appearance. But is medal never really existed. The states had, deed, caused a medal to be struck, in which they dexpressed all the glorious atchievements of the G 5

Ch.

le,

or f

e c

orl

any

mpl

fth nake

non

hips

und

eare

Holl

f u

nen

Colo

als

Lux

was

lace

he si

roop

ppe

of lift dem

cadet

egul

horse

quete

heir

which

the h

his r

guard

troop

and I

and a republic: Affertis legibus, emendatis sacris, a jutis, defensis, conciliatis regibus, vindicata m rium libertate, stabilita orbis Europæ quiete: I laws established, religion amended, kings succound defended and reconciled, the liberty of the seas serted, and the peace of Europe settled.

In reality, they boasted of nothing which the had not done: nevertheless, they caused this met to be destroyed, to appeale Lewis XIV.

The king of England, on his fide, reproach them with difrespect, in not directing their fleet lower its flag before an English ship: and the were also accused in regard to a certain picture wherein Cornelius de Witt, the brother of the pa fionary, was painted with the attributes of a con queror. Ships were represented, in the back grow of the piece, either taken or burnt. Cornelius Witt, who had really had a great share in the m ritime exploits against England, had permitted the trifling memorial of his glory: but the pictur which was in a manner unknown, was deposits in a chamber wherein scarce any body ever entered The English ministers, who presented the con plaints of their king against Holland, in writing therein mentioned certain abusive pictures. I states, who always translated the memorials of en bassadors into French, having rendered abusive, the word fautifs, trompeurs, they replied, the they did not know what these roqueish pictures (t tableaux trompeurs) were. In reality, it never the least entered into their thoughts, that it con cerned this portrait of one of their citizens, 1 did they ever conceive this could be a pretence f declaring war.

All that human prudence and ambition is capab of contriving, for the destruction of a nation, we prepared by Lewis XIV. And we have no example of the contribution of the capable of the contribution of the capable of

cre

13 4

the

ned

che ett the ture pen COD roun us d e ma d thi ctur ofite tered COM riting

T

f en ie, b

e, in all history, of such formidable preparations or so inconsiderable an enterprize : for, among all he conquerors who have subjected any part of the orld, no one ever began his conquests with fo nany regular troops, nor fo much money, as were mployed by Lewis XIV. to subject this little state f the United provinces. Fifty millions, which nake ninety-seven millions of the present French hake ninety-seven millions of the present French honey, were expended in the preparations. Thirty hips of sifty guns joined the English Fleet of an undred sail. The king, with his brother apeared upon the frontiers of Spanish Flanders and Holland, near Maestricht and Charleroy, at the head of upwards of one hundred and twelve thousand nen. The bishop of Munster, and the elector of Cologne, had near twenty thousand. The generals of the king's army were, Condé and Turenne; Luxembourg commanded under them: Vauban was to conduct the sieges. Louvois appeared in all places with his usual vigilance. A finer, and, at the same time, a better disciplined army, had never been seen. In particular, the king's houshold rer been seen. In particular, the king's houshold roops, as newly reformed, made a most gallant of life-guards, each containing three hundred gendemen; among whom, there were many young tadets, without pay, subject, with the rest, to the d, the regular duty of the service: two hundred light to see, two hundred gendarmes, five hundred muswhich were afterwards augmented to fixteen; even the hundred Switzers accompanied the king, and his regiments of French and Switzers mounted spart before his house, or before his tent. These toops, which, in general, were covered with gold examined and admiration, in the even of a people to whom and admiration, in the even of a people to whom pl and admiration, in the eyes of a people to whom magnificence

Ch. 9.

Ch

nat

hro

he

a f

wh

his

ten

we

wh

wa

we

wi

a p

for

ple

an

eve

the

for

lin

de

T

to

rep feiz

ria

the

Ho

mo

W

ge

to go

pla

tro

magnificence of every kind was intirely unknown A discipline, more strict than formerly had introduced new order among the troops. There were as yet, no inspectors of the cavalry and infantry which we have fince had. Two persons only were appointed to do this fervice. Martinet, at the time, brought the in antry under the discipline which it still continues : the chevalier de Flourille did the same thing in the cavalry. Martinet, about year before, had introduced the bayonet in some few regiments; before which time, it has never been used in a general and uniform manner This last effort of military invention, which, per haps, is the most terrible of all others, thou known before, was but little practifed ; because the use of pikes, as yet, prevailed. He also modele the construction of copper boats, which might easily transported from one place to another, upo carriages, or upon mules. The king, having these certain advantages, for the increase of h glory and power, carried with him an historia to write a relation of his victories : this was Pell fon, whose genius enabled him to write well, b did not prevent him from flattering his hero. W shall say more of him in the article concerning the

Against Turenne, Condé, Luxembourg, Vaubar an hundred and thirty thousand soldiers, a prodigious train of artillery, and plenty of money, which attempts were made to corrupt the sidelity of the governors of the enemy's towns, all the Holland had to oppose was a young prince of weak constitution, who had never seen a siege nor a battle, and about twenty-five thousand be soldiers. Prince William of Orange, aged twenty two years, had been elected captain-general of the forces, by the almost unanimous voice of the nation

WD.

tro.

ere utry

Were

tha

e ir

rille

bou

int

ha

nner

per

DOOD

le th

odela

ght b

upo

ing a

of hi torian

Peli

ill, be

. W

ing th

aubar

prod

V. WI fidelit

all tha

ce of a fiege

and ba

t went 1 of th

of th

nation

nation: and John de Witt had consented to it brough necessity. The prince of Orange, under he phlegmatic disposition of a Dutchman, had a strong ambition, and an ardent thirst of glory, which afterwards appeared upon all occasions in his conduct, but never in his conversation. temper was cold and fevere, though his parts were quick, active, and penetrating: his courage. which was undaunted, made his body, which was weak and languishing, support fatigues that were superior to his strength. He was courageous without vanity, ambitious without pride, born with aphlegmatic obstinacy proper to combat adversity, fond of business and war, unacquainted with the pleasures attendant upon greatness, or even those annexed to humanity; and, in short, almost in every thing, the contrary of Lewis XIV.

He was at first unable to make any opposition to the torrent which burst in upon his country; his forces were too inconsiderable, and even his power limited by the states. The French army fell suddenly upon Holland, which none would fuccour. The imprudent duke of Lorrain, who attempted to raise forces, and join his fortunes to those of this republic, beheld the whole province of Lorrain feized by the French troops, with the fame facility that Avignon is feized, when the French are at variance with the pope.

The king caused his troops to advance towards the Rhine, in those provinces which border upon Holland, Cologn, and Flanders. He distributed money in all the villages, to repair the damages which would be done by his troops: and if any gentleman came to make complaints, he was fure to receive a present. A person being sent from the governor of the Low Countries, to make complaints concerning fome diforders committed by the troops, the king, with his own hands gave him his portrait.

Ch.

All

wh

in C

kin

con

Ma

upo

the

abl

kin

Du

be ing

it v

pac

req

thir

ren

Th

fide

and

can

fore

and

dan

Th

dur

Th

tem tud

try

ter.

of

Wit for

bee

portrait, enriched with diamond, valued at more than twelve thousand franks. Such a behaviour drew upon him the admiration of the people, and increased the dread of his power.

The king was at the head of his houshold troom and others which were esteemed the choicest of his forces, to the number of thirty thousand men which Turenne commanded under him. The prince of Condé had the command of another army a strong as this. The other troops, sometimes commanded by Luxembourg, and fometimes by Chamilli, were to compose separate armies, as occasion might require, or to join these, if necessary. The operations were commenced by the siege of four towns at once, whose names, were it not upon this occasion, would not deserve to be mentioned in his story: these towns were Rhinberg, Orfoi, West, and Burick: and they were taken almost as foon Rhinberg did not wait the firing of a fingle cannon; for, to be the more certain of taking it, the lieutenant of the place, who was an Irifeman, named Doffary, had been corrupted; and after being guilty of the baseness to sell himself, bad the imprudence to retire to Maestricht, where the prince of Orange punished him with death.

All those towns which bordered upon the Rhins and the Isfel, surrendered. Some of the governor fent their keys, upon a distant appearance only of one or two squadrons of French troops; several officers fled out of the towns in which they were in garison, even before the enemy appeared; and the consternation was general. The prince of Orange had not troops sufficient to appear in the field. All Holland expected to be subdued, as soon as the king should have passed the Rhine. The prince of Orange, in haste, caused lines to be drawn on the other fide of that river: and, after they were finished, perceived the impossibility of keeping them-

All,

10re

iou

and

Ops,

f his

en:

ince

7 25

om-

ha-

fion

The

fout

this

hi-

elel.

foon

of a

tak-

and, had

the

hine

nors ly of

veral re in

d the

ange

. Al

s the

ce of

n the

nich

hem.

All, therefore, they now wanted to know, was, where the French would form their bridge of boats, in order, if possible, to prevent their passage. The king's real design was to pass the river over a bridge composed of those little copper boats invented by Martinet. Some of the people of the country, upon this occasion, told the prince of Condé, that the driness of the season had rendered the Rhine fordable, opposite to an old tower, which was used as a kind of custom or toll-house, and was called by the Dutch toll-huis. The king ordered the place to be founded by the count de Guiche. According to Pelisson's letters, who was an eye-witness; it was found there were not more than forty or fifty paces in the middle of the river, in this part, that required swimming. This was considered as nothing, because the horse would interrupt the current, which, besides, was far from being rapid. The passage therefore was easy, and, on the other fide, there were only four or five hundred cavalry, and two weak regiments of infantry, without any cannon. The French artillery fired upon these forces in flank, while the king's houshold troops, and the best of the cavalry, crossed without any danger, to the number of about fifteen thousand. The prince of Condé appeared by the side of them, during the passage, in one of the copper boats. The Dutch cavalry, having scarce made a faint attempt to oppose, instantly sled before the multitude, which was coming after them. Their infantry also laid down their arms, and begged for quarter. No lives were lost in the passage, except some of the cavalry, who having intoxicated themselves with drinking, did not take care to keep in the fordable part; and not a fingle person would have been killed, had it not been for the imprudence of the

ne ? y t

Fth

he

erc

A

hey

em

œu

lay f

nad · n

0

U

vith

pad

end

itul

ive

nd i

mp

eal

conc

pin

Holl

T

ders,

mom

lews

Gour

Conc

elves

Na

Was a ng to

den, o dro

the young duke de Longueville . It is faid, that his head being filled with the fumes of wine, he fired a pistol upon those of the enemy, who begged their lives upon their knees, crying out to them. No quarters to fuch scoundrels. The shot killed one of their officers; upon which the Dutch infantry, in despair, instantly retook to their arms, and made a discharge, by which the duke de Longueville was killed. A captain of horse, named Offembrouk who had not fled with the others, ran up to the prince of Condé, who having croffed the river. was then mounting his horse, and clapped his pillo to his head. The prince, by a fudden movement. changed the direction of the shot, which wounded him in the wrist; and this was the only wound the prince of Condé ever received in all his campaigns The French, being enraged at this, purfued and killed several of the infantry, which had taken to flight. Lewis XIV. passed the river with his arm upon a bridge of boats.

Such was this peculiar and extraordinary passage of the Rhine, which was celebrated then as one of those great actions which must for ever remain me morable to mankind. That air of grandeur with which the king dignified all his actions, the rapid ness of his conquests, the splendor of his reign the adoration of his court, and, finally, the dil position which the people, and more especially the Parisians, have to exaggeration, joined to that ig norance of war which is universal in great cities made this passage of the Rhine be regarded at Pari as a prodigy. The notion of it, which generall prevailed, was, that all the forces had paffed thi river by fwimming, in presence of an army which was intrenched on the other side, and amidst th fire of artillery from an impregnable fortress, calle fune 12, 1672.

Ch. 9. hat. , he

gged

em.

one

itry,

nade

Was ouk.

the

iver.

pilto

nent.

inded

d the

igns.

and

en to

arm

affage

ne o

me

with rapid

reign

e dil

ly the

at ig

cities

Pari

erall

ed thi

which

of the

calle

the

eTholus. It is certain, this passage was regarded whe enemy as almost impossible; and, indeed, they had had a strong body of good troops on e other fide, the attempt might have been danerous.

As foon as the troops had passed the Rhine, hey took Doesbourg, Zutphen, Arnheim, Noembourg, Nimegen, Skenk, Bommel, Greve-wer, &c. and there were but few hours in the ay wherein the king did not receive an account f some conquest. An officer, named Mazel, nade this request to Turenne: " If you will send me about fifty horse, I can with them take two or three towns."

Utrecht fent its keys, and capitulated, together with all the province which bears its name. Lewis nade his triumphal entry into that city, being atended by his grand almoner, his confessor, and the itular bishop of Utrecht. The great church 'was iven up to the Catholics with great folemnity; ad the bishop, who had only possessed the vain and mpty title, was, for some time, established in a eal dignity. The religion of Lewis XIV. made onquests as well as his arms; by which, in the pinion of the Catholics, he gained a right to Holland.

The provinces of Utrecht, Overissel, and Guillers, were subjected; and Amsterdam expected the moment of its flavery or ruin was at hand. ews, established in it, were earnest in offering to Gourville, the intendant and friend of the prince of Concé, two millions of florins, to secure themelves from being plundered.

Naerden, in the neighbourhood of Amsterdam, as already taken. Four only of the cavalry, going to forage, advanced as far as the gates of Muiten, where the fluices are, which may be opened odrown the country, and which is only one league from Amsterdam. The magistrates of Muiden ala ry oul

Ch. 9

uer nd lwa atio ne h

erp he on o ta

her by a a fta (as II

ban miti bli dear hadt ue f was of th F olor which arbit rece polit he f

com rose, han with

ery. ime

being under the greatest dread and consternation came and presented their keys to these four soldiers but, at last, observing the rest of the troops did m come up, they took back their keys, and thut the gates. A moment's diligence would have put the king in possession of Amsterdam: and this capita being once taken, not only the republic would have perished, but the nation of Holland would u more have existed, and even the land itself would foon have disappeared. The richest families, and those who were most desirous of liberty, prepared to embark for Batavia, and fly even to the extre mities of the world. The ships capable to make this voyage were numbered; and it was found, that fifty thousand families might be embarked, to take refuge in their new country. The Dutch would no longer have existed but in the most distant par of the East-Indies; and these European provinces which subsist only by their Asian riches, the commerce, and, if a Frenchman may fay fo, by their liberty, would on a fudden, have been ruin ed and depopulated. Amsterdam, which is the warehouse and the magazine of Europe, wherein commerce and the arts are cultivated by three hundred thousand men, would presently have be come only one vast lake. All the adjacent land require immense expence, and many thousands o men, to raife and maintain their banks: and the would probably at once have wanted the support both of men and money, and would at last have been overwhelmed by the fea, leaving Lewis XIV only the wretched glory of having destroyed on of the finest and most extraordinary monuments of human industry. The distresses of the state were increased by the divisions which commonly arise among unhappy people, who endeavour to cast the blame of public calamities iden tion. iers d no their at the

h. 9

Ch. 9.

apita vould ld no vould and pared xtre make

, tha , take vould t par nces thei o, by

ruin s the erein

thre e be land

ds of they ppor have

VIX d one nts o

nappy ubli mities

y the

alamities upon one another. The grand pensionry de Witt thought the remainder of his country ould be faved only by begging peace of the conueror. De Witt, being both a strong republican, nd jealous of his own particular authority, was lways more afraid of the prince of Orange's eleation than of the conquests of the king of France: he had even made this prince swear to observe a he dignity of stadtholder. The spirit of party, onour, interest, and authority, all excited de Witt o take care, that this oath was observed, and he herefore rather chose to see his republic subjected by a victorious king, than under the dominion of fadtholder.

On the other side, the prince of Orange, being s much attached to his country, more ambitious han de Witt, more patient under the publick calanities, and hoping every thing from time, and the boltinacy of his perseverance, was ardent in his endeavours to prevent a peace, and to obtain the hadtholdership. And though the states resolved to be for peace in spite of the prince, yet the prince was elevated to the dignity of stadtholder in spite of the de Witts.

Four deputies came to the king's camp, to imlore his clemency in the name of a republic, which, six months before, had thought itself the abitrator between kings. The deputies were not teeived by the ministers of Lewis XIV. with that politeness so peculiar to the French, who, even in he severity of government, retain their civility and complaifance. Louvois, who was proud and moole, and more capable to serve his master well, han to render him beloved, received these suppliants with haughtiness, and even with the insult of railery. They were made to return several different ines: but at last the king ordered his determina-

Ch. 9.

71

W

U

A

At I

her the

and All

blee

mul

con

cul

mai

por frie

eve

foc

fee

W

the

fu of

tion to be declared to them; which was, that the states should give up to him all they possessed on the other side of the Rhine, comprehending Nimegen together with feveral other towns and forts in the heart of their territories: that they should par him twenty millions: that the French should be masters of all the great roads of Holland both by land and water, without paying toll: that the Catho. lic religion should be every-where restored: that the republic should every year fend an embassador extraordinary to France with a gold medal, whereon should be engraved an acknowlegement, that they held their liberties of Lewis XIV. and, finally, that they thould also make satisfaction to the king of England, and the princes of the empire, paticularly those of Cologn and Munster, by whom Holland still continued to be ravaged.

These conditions of a peace, which approached so near to flavery, appeared intolerable; and the rigour of the conqueror inspired the vanquilled with a desperate courage. The Dutch resolved to die in defence of their liberty. The hearts and the hopes of the nation were all turned upon the prince of Orange. The people became enraged against the grand pensionary, who had sued for peace; and their leditious fury foon joined the &. figns and animolity of the prince's party. An attempt was immediately made against the life of in grand pensionary John de Witt; and Cornelius his brother, being afterwards accused of an attempt against the prince's life, was put 'to the rack; and, in his torments, recited the first lines of this ode of Horace, Justum & tenacem; which was applicable to the condition he was then in, and to his courage; and which, for the sake of those who do not understand Latin, is thus translated:

the pay be by

ez-

reon they

ally,

king

par-

hom

ched

d the

ed to

s and

n the

raged for

e de-

n at-

f the

us his

tempt

and,

ode of

icable

rage;

ander-

The man, in conscious virtue bold, Who dares his secret purpose hold.
Unshaken, hears the croud's tumultuous cries,
And the impetuous tyrant's angry brow defies.
FRANCIS'S HORACE.

At last, the unruly populace massacred the two brothers in the Hague: one of whom had governed the state for nineteen years with great integrity, and the other signally served it with his sword. All those violences were committed upon their bleeding bodies, of which the sury of an enraged multitude is capable. Such horrid actions are common to all nations; and the French, in particular, have been guilty of them, in regard to the marshal d'Encre, the admiral Coligny, &c. for the populace is nearly the same in all places. The friends of the pensionary were also pursued: and even Ruyter himself, the admiral of the republic, who was the only one that then fought for her with success, beheld himself surrounded with assassing in the city of Amsterdam.

In the midst of these disorders and devastations, the magistrates manifested virtues, which are seldom seen but in republics. Those of the inhabitants, who were possessed of bank-notes, ran in crouds to the bank of Amsterdam; and it was apprehended they would lay violent hands upon the public treasure. Every one was eager to get his money out of the little which it was supposed there still remained. The magistrates opened the places where this theasure was deposited; and it was sound interes, just as it had been deposited sixty years before: and the silver was even still black from the effects of the fire, by which the stadthouse had been consumed long before. The bank-notes, till now, had constantly been negotiated, and this treasure never

Ch. g h g ed upor d n Sud peri

utch

e ei

olba

ve

mir

oth

ese

oke

dn

he i

fior

as,

ire.

Af

nd th

eet

ius,

y,

Dutc

ags

onfu

hat I

and;

ince,

here

T

he a

is w

over

he c

he co

ders,

and

never touched. But now, those who insisted upon having their money, were paid out of it. Subdistinguished good-faith, and such great resources were then so much the more admirable, as Charle the second, king of England, to defray the expences of his pleasures, and his war against the Dutch, had, just at that time, become a bankruptus his subjects. And it was as dishonourable to this king, thus to violate the public faith, as it was glorious in the magistates of Amsterdam to preserve at a time when a failure might have appeared pardonable.

To this republican virtue they joined that conrage of mind, which, for redress in irremediable misfortunes, flies to extremes. They caused the banks, which kept out the fea to be cut; and the country houses, which are innumerable about Amsterdam, the villages, and the neighbouring towns, fuch as Leyden and Delft, were overwhelmed. The country-people did not repine a feeing their herds of cattle drowned in the fields. Amsterdam appeared like a vast fortress in the midst of the sea, surrounded with ships of war, which had depth of water sufficient to make them be stationed round the city. There was the greatest scarcity among the inhabitants; especially of freh water, which was fold for fixpence a pint: but they considered these necessities as more tolerable than flavery. It is worthy the observation of posterity, that Holland, when thus overwhelmed on land, and, as it were, no longer a state, yet continued formidable at fea; which, indeed, is the true element of this people.

While Lewis XIV. croffed the Rhine, and subjected three provinces; admiral Ruyter, with about an hundred ships of war, and more than fifty sireships, went upon the coasts of England, in search of the fleet of the two kings; whose united force

had

1.9

pt to this

glove it.

par-

iable

d the d the

ver-

ne at

elds.

them

eateft

fresh : but

rable

f pod on

con-

the

fub-

bout fire-

earch

force

had

d not been able to put to sea a naval armament perior to that of the republic. The English and such fought like nations accustomed to dispute empire of the ocean. The battle, called the olbay, lasted one intire day. Ruyter, who first the we the signal, attacked the ship of the English of the lightly was the duke of Verk that in the lightly of the English of the En miral, in which was the duke of York, the king's other. The victory in the engagement between the two admirals, was gained by Ruyter. The take of York, being obliged to change his ship, id not again appear before the admiral of Holland. The thirty French ships had very little share in the flion; and the consequence of this engagement as, that the coasts of Holland were rendered seare.

After this, Ruyter, notwithstanding his fears, bott ad the opposition of his countrymen, brought the uring set of India merchantment into the Texel; and nus, on one side, defended and enriched his couny, while, on the other, it was destroyed. The Outch even continued their commerce; and no ags but theirs were seen in the Indian seas. A war, onful of France one day telling the king of Persia, nat Lewis XIV. had conquered almost all Holand; How can that be? replied the Persian monarch; nce, for one French ship in the port of Ormus, here are always twenty Dutch.

The prince of Orange, in the mean time, had he ambition of shewing himself a good citizen. le offered the state the revenue of his posts, and is whole fortune, for the defence of liberty. He overed with inundations all those passages through thich the French might penetrate into the rest of he country. By the quickness and secrecy of his egotiations he roused the emperor, the empire, he council of Spain, and the government of Flaners, from their lethargy; and even disposed Engand towards peace. To conclude, the king had entered

entered Holland in the month of May, and, in July, all Europe began to conspire against him.

Monteroy, governor of Flanders, secretly cause some regiments to march to the relief of the Unite provinces. The council of the emperor Leopol sent Montecuculi, at the head of near twenty thou sand men; and the elector of Brandenbourg, who had twenty-five thousand soldiers in his pay, march ed with them under his command.

As no more conquests could be made in a country overwhelmed with water, the king now quite his army. The preservation of the conquered provinces was difficult, and Lewis was for keeping certain glory. Satisfied with having taken so man towns in two months, he returned to St. German in the midst of summer; and, leaving Turent and Luxembourg to complete the war, he enjoyed the glory of his triumph. Monuments of the conquests were erected, while the powers of the rope were labouring to deprive him of them.

CHAPTER X.

The evacuation of Holland; and the secon conquest of Franche-Comté.

WE think it necessary here to remind the who may read this work, that it is not merely a narrative of campaigns, but rather an history of the manners of men. There are book enough which contain all the minute particulars of martial exploits, and relations of human madne and misery. The design of this essay is to pain the principal characters in these revolutions, and exclude the multitude of little sacts, in order the only those which are considerable, and (if the

oyn inifi e o

h. 1

n b

cte

Fra

me inif

unf

the

r Lies.

V. 1

ngla

res.

gr

ue i

er ir

Th

pain

opp

as g urfui

ond e D

cted

refer oops

as e

ns.

nity cake Vo

e aft

Id

pol

wh

rch

our

oitte

pro

ing

man

mair

rent

e en

ofh

f Eu

econ

d tho

abe done) the spirit by which they were concted.

France was then at the height of its glory. me of its generals imprinted veneration. His inifers were regarded as geniuses superior to the unsellors of other princes; and Lewis seemed to the sole king in Europe. In reality, the empe-Leopold never appeared personally in his aries. Charles II. king of Spain, fon of Philip V. was as yet in his infancy; and the king of agland never shewed any activity but in his pleares.

All these princes, and their ministers, were guilty great faults. England acted contrary to the ue maxims of state-policy, in uniting with France the elevation of a power, which it was rather trinterest to humble.

The emperor, the empire, and the council of pain, were yet more to blame, in not immediateopposing the torrent. But however, Lewis XIV. as guilty of an error as great as all theirs, in not volving such easy conquests with sufficient rapidity. and Turenne were for demolishing most of Dutch towns; faying, that states were not subfled by garisons, but by armies; and that having telerved only one or two places for a retreat, the pops ought to march with the utmost rapidity, to implete the conquest. Louvois, on the contrary, is no as every where for having fortifications and gariran hims. This was his humour; and it was also the book ag's. Louvois, by this means, had more emulars opments in his gift, extended the power of his madne inistry, and took a pleasure in acting contrary to o pair the opinions of the two greatest generals of the
, and the period of the second VOL. I. H places; and gave his enemy time to take bre The history of the greatest princes is frequent to recapitulation of the universal faults of mankined

t

bulo

our

fol

the

rs f

mma

o h

ts. I erwa

ntain

After the king's departure, affairs began to on a different aspect. Turenne was forced toma towards Westphalia, to oppose the Imperial Monteroy, the governor of Flanders, without be authorized by the timid council of Spain, reinfor the prince of Orange's little army, with about thousand men; which enabled this prince to a take the French till winter, and even to balance the of fortune. Winter at last arrived, and the inun tions of Holland were covered with ice. And Luxembourg, who commanded in Utrecht, car on a new kind of war, unknown to the French, year endangered Holland in as terrible a manner as

He, one night, affembled near twelve thou foldiers from the neighbouring garifons, for wh skaits had been prepared; and, putting himse red a their head, he skaited with them over their wards Leyden and the Hague: but a thaw comence ing on, it preserved the Hague; and his are gain being surrounded with water, unable to get off anden ice, and destitute of provisions, was ready to ded wish. In order to get back to Utrecht, they to the forced to march upon a narrow and slippery be wish which could scarce admit four to walk in from sary which could they get at this bank but by attach with ming a fort, which, without artillery, seemed impossed the army only all sage had ay, it would have been almost destroyed with hunger and fatigue. Luxembourg was without the former of the fatigue. fource; but fortune, which had faved the Happengre faved his army by the cowardice of the command the on of this fort, who abandoned his post without in. T reason. A thousand things are done in war, as a as in common life, which are incomprehensible. bres ent nki

to ma

riali

t be

for

out

OR

he fe nun

nensib

could

this was certainly of the number. All the tof this enterprize was a cruelty which rened the French completely odious in this coun-Bodegrave and Suvamerdam, two rich and pulous towns, which might be compared to many our cities, were abandoned to be plundered by soldiers, as a reward for their fatigues. They these two towns on fire; and, by the light of flames, committed all kinds of cruelty and dethery. It is aftonishing, that the French solns should shew themselves so barbarous, being manded by a prodigious number of officers, and to had very justly acquired the reputation of be-truly courageous and humane. The excesses ich, y committed were so exaggerated by the inhabi-tes, that I have seen Dutch books, forty years awards, wherein children were learned to read, ts, that I have seen Dutch books, forty years awards, wherein children were learned to read, thou training a relation of this action, and drawn up ha design to inspire succeeding generations with med and detestation of the French.

In the mean time, the king by his negotiations, we ded and detestation of all the European princes. I gained the duke of Hanover. The elector of andenbourg, when he commenced the war, conted a treaty; but it was soon after broken. We were none of the German courts wherein wis had not his pensioners. His emissaries in magary somented the troubles of that province; with was severely treated by the council of Vienna. I impossible with the distribution of the war against Holland, and withstanding the universal exclamations of the thou seed withstanding the universal exclamations of the thou seed with nation, which was filled with indignation that on the contrary, it wanted to curb that ambihout a the repose of Europe was disturbed by the r, as and negotiations of Lewis; and at last, he heals

H 2

gem

twee

nglai

an e

ter 1

lof

Ru

thu

ondu

ry a

Le

ade n, 1

erfe

the ents

y t nces

in

renc

pain

rifo

in,

ters

and

hick

00p

em.

thi

ous

ore

fly

pa

le er

could not prevent the emperor, the empire, and Spa from joining the Dutch, and folemnly declari war against him. He had changed the course of fairs so intirely, that the Dutch, who were his nat ral allies, were become the friends Spain. T emperor Leopold fent tardy fuccours; but he she ed great animofity. It is faid, that when he we to fee the troops at Egra, which he had caused to affembled there, he received the communion un the road, and immediately after took a crucifix his hand, and called upon God to bear witness the justice of his cause. There might have be propriety in such an action in the time of the co sades: but Leopold's prayer did not now preve the progress of the king of France's arms.

It immediately appeared how greatly his man was improved. Instead of thirty ships, which he been joined the year before to the English see now forty were joined, without including the fir The officers had learned the excellentral of fighting practifed by the English, by which th had combated those of their enemies the Duto The duke of York, afterwards James the fecon was the first who invented the art of giving orde at fea, by means of the various movements of flag Before that time, the French did not know how draw up a fleet in order of battle. The whole their experience confifted in fighting one ship again another: they were unskilled to make many mor in concert, and imitate at fea the evolutions of land armies, whose feveral divisions mutually succes and support each other. They did what the Ro mans had done before them, who, in one year time, learned of the Carthaginians the art of nav combats, and equalled their masters.

The vice-admiral d'Etrée, and Martel his lieu tenant, did honour to the military industry the French nation, in three successive naval en gagements

. I

Spai larin

of a

nat

T

her

we

Upo

fix

es

e be

cro

reve

nari

ch h

flee

e fir

t rul

h th

Dutd

econ

orde

f flag

WU

ole

again

mo

fland

ucco

ne Re

year

f nav

is lieu

ftry 4

ral en ments

gements, which hapened in the month of June tween the Dutch fleet, and that of France and ngland b. Admiral Ruyter was more admired an ever in these three actions. D'Etrée, in his ter to Colbert, had these words: "I would have lost my life to have obtained the victory which Ruyter has acquired." And d'Etrée deserved to thus spoken of by Ruyter. The courage and induct on both fides were so equal, that the vic-ry always remained undecided.

Lewis, who, by the endeavours of Colbert. ade his people seamen, by the industry of Vauin, rendered the art of war by land still more sfest. He went in person to besiege Maestricht. the same time when these three naval engageents happened at sea. Maestricht was to him a y to the Low Countries, and the United pronces. The place was strong, and defended by intrepid governor, named Farjaux, who was a tenchman, and had entered into the service of pain, and afterwards into that of Holland. The rison was composed of five thousand men. Vaun, who conducted the fiege, for the first time ed those parallels, invented by the Italian engiters in the service of the Turks at the siege of andy: and he added to them the places of arms, hich are made in the trenches, to draw up the ops in order of battle, and the better to rally em, in case of sallies from the besieged. Lewis, this siege, shewed himself more exact and laboous than he had been before. By his example he ured his troops, till then accused of a slight and My courage, which was soon dissipated by fatigue, patience in labour. Maestricht surrendered at eend of eight days .

H 3

The 7. 14. and 21. of June 1673. June 24. 673.

10

Hior

hin

e bi

of

Du

The

er f

be

ance

thr

ion

er,

he i

nce

ouli

evi

ch

ifor

um

her

oif

one

alio

a,

rar

725

itat

tor

610 ene

Ch.

He shewed a severity which appeared even great, in order to strengthen and improve his litary discipline. The prince of Orange, w to oppose his rapid conquests, had only offer without emulation, and foldiers without course made them better by the rigour of his pun ments; for he caused all those who abandoned the posts to be hanged. The king also used chast ments. A very brave officer, named Dupas, rendered Naerdin to the prince of Orange, will was the first time the king lost a town. deed, the prince kept it only four days: but king did not regain it till after an engagement wh lasted five hours: which was fought to avoid a neral affault upon bad fortifications, which a we and fatigued garison would not have been able The king, being incenfed at the first front which his arms had received, condemned D pas to be led through Utrecht, with a shovel in hand, and his fword to be broken. This was ignominy, which perhaps, is unnecessary with gard to the French officers, who are fensible enou of glory, not to be governed by the fear of than The governors of fortified towns are obliged, their rules, to fustain three assaults; but this is the number of those laws which are seldom of ferved.

The endeavours of the king, the genius of Va ban, the severe vigilance of Louvois, the expe ence and the great skill of Turenne, and the int pid activity of the prince of Condé, could not repair the error which had been committed in kee ing too many towns, weakening the army, a neglecting the opportunity of entering Amile dam.

The prince of Condé in vain endeavoured to P netrate into the heart of Holland, when overwheld ed with waters. Turenne could neither prevent the jun ctio

Ch.

eveni

his

e, w offic

Coura

puni

red th

chaffi

as, A

, whi

. 1

but

t whi

id ag

a we

able

firft

ed D

l in

Was

vith t

enou

fham

ed,

is is

m o

f Va

expe

intr

not

kee

y, at

mfte

to p

helm

nt th

tion of Montecuculi and the prince of Orange, hinder the prince of Orange from taking Bonn. e bishop of Munster, who had sworn the destrucof the States general, was himself attacked by Dutch d.

The parliament of England forced its king to er seriously into negotiations of peace, and cease be the necessary instrument of the grandeur of ance. And now it became necessary to abandon three provinces of Holland, with as much expeion as they had been conquered. But this hower, was not done without their being ransomed. ne intendant Robert drew out of the single pronce of Utrecht fixteen hundred and fixty-eight befand florins. The French were in fuch a hurry eracuate the country which they had taken with ch rapidity, that twenty-eight thousand Dutch isoners were released at a crown a man. amphal arch of the gate of St. Denis, and the her monuments of these conquests were scarce ished, when the conquests themselves were abanoned. The Hollanders, in the course of this inalion, had the glory to dispute the empire of the a, and the address to transport the theatre of the ar by land out of their own country. Lewis XIV. as regarded, in Europe, as having been too precihate and presumptuous in the splendor of his trantory triumph. The fruits of this enterprize were bloody war to maintain again & Spain, the Empire, nd Holland, united; the being abandoned by lagland, and at last by Munster, and even Coogae; and the leaving more hatred than admiration fhim, in those territories, the conquest of which ne was forced to relinquish.

The king alone sustained the efforts of all the memies which he had raised against himself. His power, and the wisdom of his government, were d Nov. 1673.

ffage

other

efanç

erfect

e arn

deed

orall

ings

thed

eges,

wns

ry. rhich

x we

ing:

f Fra

emai

uftri

fLe

The

hic

tho

thin

nost

heir

Wa

ion-

yet more conspicuous, when it became necessarys him to defend himself against so many unit powers, and the greatest generals, than when had forced Franche-Comté, and one half of Holand, out of the hands of defenceles enemies.

The advantage which an absolute monarch, whole finances are well managed, has over other kings was more particularly remarkable: he, at one and the same time, caused an army of about twenty-three thousand men, to march, under Turenne, again the Imperialists; and another of forty thousand under Condé, against the prince of Orange: a considerable body of troops was also affembled upon the frontiers of Rousillon: and a fleet, filled with soldiers, was sent to carry the war against the Spaniards, even as far as Messina. He marched him self a second time to make himself master of Franche Comté; and he every-where defended himself, and attacked others at the same time.

In this enterprize upon Franche-Comté, the fa periority of his great politics appeared. It was necessary for him to gain to his interest, or a least to render neuter the Switzers; a people who are as formidable as they are poor, who are always armed, jealous to the last degree of their liberty invincible upon their own frontiers, and who had begun already to take umbrage at feeing Lewis XIV. again in their neighbourhood. The emperor and Spain folicited the thirteen cantons to grant, a least, a free passage to their troops, for the relief of Franche-Comté; which, through the negligence of the Spanish ministry, had been left without de-The king, on his fide, pressed the Switzers to refuse this passage: But the empire and Spain using nothing more than arguments and entreaties, the king, with a million of money paid down, and a promise of fix hundred thousand livres, determined the Switzers to do as he defired; and the paffage lol noi ngs

and and

COD

ipor with

Spa

nim

che

and

e fu-

or at ways erty

had ewis

perof

ief of gence

t de

itzers

Spain

aties,

and eter-

d the

Mage

sfage was refused. Lewis, accompanied by his other, and the fon of the great Condé, besieged clançon. The king loved sieges, understood them afectly well, and therefore committed the care of e army in the field to Condé and Turenne. But, deed, he never belieged a town without being orally certain to take it. Louvois prepared all ings so effectually, the troops were so well furified, and Vauban, who conducted almost all the eges, was fo great a master in the art of taking owns, that the king's glory was in perfect feculy. Vauban directed the attacks at Befancon. hich was taken in nine days e; and, at the end of x weeks, all Franche-Comté was subjected to the ing: after which it continued under the dominion fFrance, seems to be for ever annexed to it, and mains as a monument of the weakness of the ustrian-Spanish ministry, and the strength of that fLewis XIV.

CHAPTER XI.

The fine campaign, and death of Marshal de Turenne.

WHILE the king made a rapid conquest of Franche-Comté, with that facility and èclat thich still attended upon his fortune; Turenne, tho only defended the frontiers on the side of the thine, displayed every thing that is greatest, and nost consummate, in the art of war. Men shew their abilities by the difficulties they surmount; and was this which gained Turenne so high a reputation in this campaign.

[•] May 15. 1674. H 5

He, at first, made a long and rapid march paffed the Rhine at Philipsbourg , marched night to Sintzheim, forced that place, and, at the same time, attacked and defeated Caprara, the en peror's general, and the old duke of Lorrain, Charle IV. who had spent all his life in losing his territo ries, and raising troops, and who had lately unite his little army with part of the emperor's. To renne, after having defeated him, pursued him, a again defeated his cavalry at Ladimbourg b; from whence he hastened to the prince de Bournonville another general of the Imperialists, who only wai ed for fresh troops to open himself a passage into A face. Turenne prevented the junction of the troops, attacked Bournonville, and forced him quit the field of battle c.

The empire affembled all its forces against him seventy thousand Germans entered Alface, when they besieged Brissac and Philipsbourg. Turent had not more than twenty thousand effective men most. The prince of Condé sent him a small box of cavalry from Flanders: after which he travers valt mountains covered with snow, and, on a so den, appeared in upper Alface, in the midft of the enemy's quarters, who imagined he was quiet Lorrain, and thought the campaign was at an end He defeated those troops which opposed him Mulhausen d, and took two thousand prisoners He then marched to Colmar, where the elector Brandenbourg, who was called the grand elector and was then general of the Imperial armies, hadh quarters. He arrived just at the time when the prince and the other generals were fitting down table; so that they had only just time to escape and the field became covered with fugitives.

December 1674.

h.

Tu

ng :

mle

the

on c

ctor

A, 1

inqu

erab

nd t

e R

Al

erle

Recu

irec

fT

hat

ad

ary

ing'

andi f the

ot th

or th

It i

iente

rated

s the

intzl

nd fo

iges,

ities,

pecta

² June 1674. b July 1674. Cotober 1674 ad d

arch

renn

Turenne, who thought he had done nothing, fo Turenne, who thought he had done nothing, lo day as there remained any thing to do, posted at the mself near Turkheim, in order to attack a part the enemy's infantry. The advantageous situation of the post which he had chosen, rendered his strike story certain: he defeated this infantry; and, at In the cory certain. He detected this infantly, and particularly the detected this infantly, and provided and dispersed, even without any considerable engagement. Also remained to the king, for ad the Imperial generals were compelled to repassiville to Rhine.

What All these successive actions, pursued with such and represent a conducted with so much art, and to A effeverance, conducted with so much art, and the secuted with so great expedition, were equally adimt sired by the French and the enemy. The glory Turenne was even increased, when it was known, him hat every thing he had done in this campaign, when ad been against the will of the court, and conand been against the will of the court, and conirem ary to the repeated orders sent by Louvois in the ing's name. To resist the all-powerful Louvois, lood and be answerable for the consquence, notwithiverse anding the exclamations of the court, the orders as such the king, and the hatred of the ministry, was of the least instance of the courage of Turenne, since the least exploit of the campaign.

It must be consessed, that those, whose humanity in the superior to their esteem of military exploits la-im to has superior to their esteem of military exploits, laconer mented the glory of this campaign. It was celecore mated as much through the miseries of the people, estor as the expeditions of Turenne. After the battle of madh intzheim, he put the Palatinate, which was a fine on the ad fertile country, full of populous towns and vilown to ges, to fire and fword. The elector Palatine, escape om the top of his castle at Manheim, beheld two ities, and five-and-twenty towns, in flames; a pectacle which at once excited in him both rage 167 and despair, and made him challenge Turenne to fingle combat, by a letter which he fent to him orps filled with reproaches. Turenne having fent the nous letter to the king, who commanded him not to a cept the challenge, he answered the elector's con arly plaints and defiance, only by a vague and infignifica compliment. It was the stile and manner of To renne always to express himself with moderation and ambiguity.

[·] January 5. 1675.

He, with the same indifference, destroyed ovens, and laid waste part of the country of A face, to prevent the enemy from sublisting. H afterwards permitted his cavalry to ravage Loral where they committed fuch disorders, that the it tendant, who, on his side, ruined Lorrain with pen, frequently wrote and fent to him to put all Turenne always coldly replied to these excesses. I will send him an answer at a proper time. Hen ther chose to be called the father of the soldier who were entrusted to him, than of the people who, according to the laws of war, are always crificed to them. All the mischief done by him? peared necessary; his glory covered every thing and, besides, the seventy thousand Germans, whi he had prevented from penetrating into France would have committed a great deal more misch there than he had done in Alface, Lorrain, and Palatinate.

The prince of Condé, on his side, fought a batt in Flanders, which was much more bloody than these actions of the viscount de Turenne, but w less successful, and less decisive; either because situation of the places was less favourable to his or because he had not taken his measures so we or rather because he had abler generals, and bet troops to oppose. This battle was that of Sen The marquis de Feuqueres is for having it call only a combat; because the action was not between two armies regularly drawn up, and because all

col

n ei

et,

f an

T with.

rinc

waite

ear

Span

of O

cient

mani

mire

com

Secur

three

fusio

lized

Ofa

expo

mor

thre

ter t ed,

of C

mol

on b

cont fligh

reti

ing

rati

Wer

tak

the

him

atio

ed th f A

таі

olie

le n

dier ople

ys I

m a hing

whi

rand isch

ind t

batt

han i

ut w

ule t o hit

we

bett

Sen

call

etwa

all d orps did not act. Nevertheless, people are unanithe nous in calling this tharp and bloody action a battle. on an engagement between three thousand men, regu-con arly drawn up, all the little corps of which should-fice of, would be only a combat. 'Tis the importance.'

To f an action which always determines its name.

The prince of Condé was to keep the field with about forty-five thousand men, against the waited for the enemy's army to pass a defile at Senef, pear Mons; attacked part of the rear, composed of Spaniards and gained a great advantage. The prince the cient precaution in the passage of the defile; but the a sto manner in which he romedied the disorder was admired; and Condé was blamed for renewing the combat afterwards, against enemies who were too securely intrenched. The engagement was renewed three several times. The two generals, in this confusion of errors, and great actions, equally signalized their courage, and their presence of mind. Of all the battles fought by the great Concé, he exposed his own life and the lives of his foldiers more upon this occasion than any other. He had three horses killed under him; and was desirous, after three bloody attacks, to hazard a fourth. It feemed, says an officer who was present, as if the prince of Condé alone was desirous of fighting. What is most extraordinary in this action is, that the troops on both sides, after the bloodiest and most obstinate contests, being seized with a panic terror, took to flight in the night; and the next day the two armies setired, each on its own side, neither of them having gained the field of battle, or the victory, and both father equally weakned than vanquished. There were near seven thousand killed, and five thousand taken prisoners, on the side of the French; and the loss of the enemy was nearly the same. So CON much n th

The

and

com

tatio

lage

choc

kille

the o

refr

fam

It fo

the

the arti

wit

Tu

who

COD

all

fo

2 0

onl

fer

Ne

fol

W

the

kn

du

W

W

20

much bloodshed, without any advantage, prevented both armies from undertaking any thing considerable: yet it was of such consequence for the prince of Orange, to give reputation to his arms, that, to make it believed he had gained the victory, he bessed Oudenarde: but the prince of Condé proved he had not lost the battle, by causing the siege to be immediately raised, and by pursuing the prince of Orange.

Both France and the allies, upon this occasion, observed the vain ceremony of thanksgiving to heaven for a victory which neither of them had obtained. This practice has been introduced, to encourage the people, whom it is always necessary to deceive.

Turenne, in Germany, with a small army, continued those progresses which were the effect of his genius. The council of Vienna, no longer daring to trust the fortune of the empire to princes who had but ill defended it, again placed, at the head of its armies, Montecuculi, who had defeated the Turks in the battle of St. Gothard; and who, in spite of Turenne and Condé, had joined the prince of Orange, and stopped the successes of Lewis XIV. after his conquest of three provinces of Holland.

It has been remarked, that the greatest generals of the empire have frequently been Italians. Italy, in its declension and slavery, still produces men, who frequently revive the remembrance of what she was of old. Montecuculi was the only man worthy to be opposed against Turenne. They had both reduced war into an art. They spent four months in following and observing each other in their marches and encampments; which were more applicated than victories both by the officers of France and the Empire. Each of them penetrated the other's designs, by what he would himself have done in

II.

ited

der

nce

, to

be-

ved

e to

ince

ion,

to

had

to

00-

his

ing

vho d of

the

in

nce wis

01-

rals

ly,

en,

the

or.

oth

ths

eir

ap.

nce

o.

in

n the same situation; and they were never deceived. They opposed each other with patience, stratagem, and activity; and were at last upon the point of coming to an engagement, and staking their reputations upon the hazard of a battle, near the village of Saltzbach; when Turenne, in going to choose a place whereon to erect a battery, was killed by a cannon-shotf. No one is ignorant of the circumstances of his death: but we cannot here refrain a review of the principal of them, for the fame reason that they are still talked of every day. It feems as if one could not too often repeat, that the same bullet which killed him, having shot off the arm of Saint Hilaire, lieutenant-general of the artillery, his fon came and bewailed his misfortune with many tears: but the father, looking towards Turenne, faid; It is not I, but that great man, who should be lamented. These words may be compared with the most heroic sayings recorded in all history; and are the best elogy that can be beflowed upon Turenne. It is uncommon, under a despotic government, where people are actuated only by their private interests, for those who have ferved their country, to die regretted by the public. Nevertheless, Turenne was lamented both by the foldiers and people; and Louvois was the only one who rejoiced at his death. The honours which the king ordered to be paid to his memory, are known to every one; and that he was interred at Saint Denis, in the same manner as the constable du Guesclin, above whom he was elevated by the voice of the public, as much as the age of Turenne was superior to the age of the constable.

Turenne had not always been successful in his wars: he had been defeated at Marindal, Retel, and Cambray: he had also committed errors, and

f July 27. 1675.

h. 1

apab

roba

harsh

W

eath

elt. ener

ther

pent

o fea

f 7

Vaub

ianc

vigo

enn

The

t, b eat (

rifin

alhe

S W

brou

ody

out with

brou

which

ough

He

he p te f

aut

Wen

Mas

was himself so great a man as to confess them. He never made great and celebrated conquests, nor ever gained those great and important victories, by which nations are subjected: but having always repaired his defeats, and done a great deal with a little, he was regarded as the greatest general in Europe, at a time when the art of war was more studied and better understood than ever. over, though he was reproached for his infidelity in the wars of the Fronde: though, at the age of near fixty years, love made him reveal the fecreis of the state; and though he had exercised cruelties in the Palatinate, which did not appear necessary; yet he had always the happiness to preserve the reputation of an honest, wise, and moderate man; because his virtues and his great abilities, which were peculiar to himself, made those errors and weaknesses pardonable in him, which he had in common with the rest of mankind. If he can be compared to any one, we prefume, that, among all the generals of preceding ages, Gonzalvo de Cordova, furnamed the Great general, is the man whom he most resembles.

He was born a Calvinist, and changed that religion for the Catholic, in 1668. but the motives to his change were never known: for, according to what is faid by those who knew him, he had great obscurities in his conduct, as well as in his converfation. All that we do know is, that he had miltresses at the time when he changed his religion, and that most certainly he was not without ambition. From the little knowledge we have of mankind, it will be generally granted, that a man, at fifty years of age, seldom quits one religion for another, through any conviction of error in his former tenets. The king, when he made him a marshal-general, said; I wish you would oblige me to do Something more for you. These words might be capable

h. II.

11

Ho

nor

by

-51

h a

in

ore

re.

lity

of

ets

ties

ry;

re.

in;

ich

and

m.

m-

the

va,

he

eli.

to

to

eat

er-

if.

on,

bi-

an-

at

for

01-

ar-

be ble apable to produce an abjuration: and it is not imrobable, that he, who defired to command over parshals, should also wish to be constable.

What happened in Alface immediately after his eath, rendered the loss of him still more sensibly elt. Montecuculi, who, by the skill of the French eneral, had been kept three whole months on the ther side of the Rhine, passed that river the moent he was informed he had no longer Turenne o fear. He fell upon a part of the army, which ad not yet recovered its consternation on the loss f Turenne, under the command of Lorges and Vauban, two lieutenant-generals, who were at vaiance with each other; and tho' the troops made vigorous defence, they could not prevent the 1merialists from penetrating into Alface, which Tuenne had always hindered them from entering. The army not only wanted a general to command t, but one also who might repair the recent deeat of the marshal de Crequi, a man of an enterriling courage, capable of the greatest and the affielt enterprizes, and dangerous to his country, swell as to the enemy. He had been vanquished, brough his own misconduct, at Consarbruck. ody of twenty thousand Germans defeated, and ut to pieces, the little army of Crequi; and he with difficulty escapeds. after which, he hastened brough new perils, to throw himself into Treves; which he defended with his courage, when he with rather to have succoured it with his prudence. he was for burying himself under the ruins of he place; for, after the breach was practicable, te still persisted in its defence. But the garifon autinied, and Bois-jourdan, at the head of them, Went to capitulate at the breach. A base action as never before so audaciously committed. He

⁴ August 11. 1675.

Ch.

villin

onfu

ver.

our re

ormo

coura

well

T

orison

contr

orinc

whic

Cond

in Fl

and his p

fity h

equa

renn

gress

culi

this

of S

cease

have

fello

you

ever

the

of

nam

arm

very

ecli

any.

of I

the

1

threatened the marshal with death, if he refused to fign the treaty: but Crequi, with some officers who continued faithful to him, retired into the church, and rather chose to be taken at discretion, than to capitulate.

To replace the men which France had lost in a many sieges and battles, Lewis XIV. was advised not to rely, as usual, upon the recruits out of the militia, but to cause the ban and arriere-ban to

march.

By an antient custom, which is now disused, the possession of siefs were obliged to go to the wars, at their own expence, for the service of their sovereign lord, and to continue in arms a certain number of days. In this service consisted the greated part of the laws of the nations of Europe, when a state of barbarity: but now all things are changed; and the most inconsiderable state raises troops, which are constantly kept in pay, and are formed into regular disciplined corps.

Lewis XIII. once convoked the gentry of his kingdom; and Lewis XIV. now followed his example. The gentry, being affembled into a corps marched under the command of the marquis, after wards the marshal de Rochefort, to the frontiers of Flanders, and afterwards upon those of Germany: but this corps was neither considerable nor uleful, nor could be rendered fo. Those gentlement who loved war, and were capable of the fervice were already officers in the army: those whom age or difgust confined, never quitted their abodes; and the others, whose ordinary occupation was the cultivation of their estates, went, against their inclination, to the number of about four thousand Nothing could less resemble a militaty corps: be ing all mounted and armed differently, without experience, and without discipline, unable and unwilling off.

the tion,

n 60

viled

the to

the

ove-

um-

ate

en in

ing-

ops,

med

his

ex-

rps

ter-

S OF

ny:

ful,

ien,

rice

om

es;

was

reir

and.

be-

out

un.

ing

onfulion, and we were difgusted with them for wer. These were the last traces we have seen in our regular troops, of that antient chivalry, which formerly composed those troops, who with the courage natural to the nation, never made war so well as now.

Turenne being dead, Crequi defeated, and a risoner, Treves taken, and Montecuculi raising contributions in Alface; the king concluded, the which were discouraged by the death of Turenne. Condé therefore lest the marshal de Luxembourg in Flanders, there to support the fortune of France, and went to stop the progress of Montecuculi; and his patience now appeared as great as his impetuostyhad done at Senef. His genius, which was equal to every thing, displayed the same art as Turenne's. By two encampments he stopped the progress of the German troops, and forced Montecuculi to raise the sieges of Hanau and Saverne. After this campaign, which was less brilliant than that of Senef, but more serviceable, he prince of Conde ceased to appear in the wars. He was desirous to have his fon command, and offered to be his counfellor; but the king did not choose to have either young men or princes to be his generals: and had, even with difficulty, prevailed on himself to accept the service of Condé himself. Louvois's jealousy of Turenne had contributed, as much as the name of Gondé, to place him at the head of the armies.

The prince retired to Chantili, from whence he very rarely came to Versailles, to behold his glory eclipsed, in a place where the courtier never regards any thing but favour. He passed the remainder of his days, tormented with the gout, relieving the severity of his pains, and employing the leisure

Ch :

In

Cond

He w

afraic

appea

emp

erinc

battle

for fi

they

for v

the p

did i

cauf

who

men

king

cert Infault

char

pati

wiii whi

Lu

eac

the

of

Wa:

ed

80

of his retreat, in the conversation of men of genius of all kinds, with which France then abound ed. He was worthy of their conversation; as he was not unacquainted with any of those arts or kis ences in which they shine. He continued to be admired even in his retreat : but, at last, that devouring fire, which, in his youth, had made him an hero, impetuous and full of passions, having confumed the strength of his body, which was naturally rather agile than robust, he declined before his time; and the strength of his mind decaying with that of his body, there remained nothing of the great Condé, during the two last years of his life: he died in 1680. and Montecuculi retired from the service of the emperor, at the same time when the prince of Condé ceased to command the armies of France.

CHAPTER XII.

From the death of Turenne to the peace of Nimegen, in 1678.

A FTER the death of Turenne, and the retreat of the prince of Condé, the king continued the war against the Empire, Spain, and Holland, with as much success as before. He was served by officers, who had formed themselves under these two great men. He had Louvois, who was of greater service to him than a general; because his foresight enabled the generals to undertake whatever they had a mind. The troops, which had long been victorious, continued to be animated by the same spirit, which the presence of a king, who was constantly successful, always inspires.

In the course of this war, he, in person, took Condéa, Bouchainb, Valenciennesc, and Cambraya. He was accused, at the siege of Bouchain, of being afraid to give battle to the prince of Orange, who appeared at the head of fifty thousand men, and at-tempted to throw succours into the place: and the prince of Orange was also reproached for not giving battle to Lewis XIV. when he might have done it: for such is the fate of kings, and of generals, that they are always blamed both for what they do, and for what they do not do : but neither the king nor the prince of Orange were blameable. The prince did not give battle, though he wished to do it, because Monterey, governor of the Low Countries, who was in the army, would not expose his government to the hazard of a decifive event : and as the king did whatever he defired, and took a town in presence of his enemy, the glory of the campaign certainly remained with him.

In regard to Valenciennes, it was taken by affault, through one of those singular events which characterize the empetuous courage of the French nation.

IT.

ge-

nd.

he

ſci.

be de-

nim

ing

na-

ore

ing

of

his

red

ime

the 0.

re-

on-

and

He

·m·

011-

ge-

rals The

ued.

ore-

al-

In

The king, in the carrying on of this siege, had with him his brother, and five marshals of France; which were d'Humieres, Schomberg, la Feuillade, Luxembourg, and de Lorges. The marshals had each of them their day of command by turns. All the operations were directed by Vauban.

They had not as yet taken any of the cutworks of the place. The first thing necessary to be done, was to attack two half moons; behind which there was also a great crown-work, palisaded, strengthened with a row of pointed stakes, and surrounded by a ditch, with several cross-ways. In this crown-

^a April 26. 1676. ^b May 11. 1676. ^c Mar. 17. 1677. ^d April 5. 1677.

rgu

b th

ran

At

ulc

fth

nou

rork nit

ot : near

nen hem

ot i

lige and i

vaic

he e

over

6 th

be

חפתו

ad !

B

tary

a cor

erdo

the g

n t

£ -e tem

2 001

derb

F 413 Medi

10.70

work there was also another work, furrounded b another ditch. After the taking of all these in trenchments, there was a branch of the Scheld get over, and then another work, called a paté behind which ran the great stream of the Scheld which was deep and rapid, and served as a ditch the wall. Finally, the wall itself was defended large ramparts; the works in general covered wit cannon; and the garifon confifting of three thousand men, who were prepared with every thing necessar to make a long defence. The king held a council of war for the attack of the outworks. It was usual always to make the attacks in the night, in order to approach the ene my without being perceived, and to spare the bloo of the foldiers. Vauban proposed to make this a tack in the day-time: but all the marshals of France disapproved his proposal; and Louvois condemne it also: nevertheless, Vauban persisted in it, wit the confidence of a man who is certain of there fonableness of what he advances. "You are de " firous, faid he, to spare the blood of the soldiers " you will do this most effectually by making the " attack in the day time, when they may fight " without confusion and disorder, and without an

" danger of their firing upon one another; which " happens but too often in the night. You delt " also to surprise the enemy, who always expect " and are prepared for, our attacks in the night

" we should therefore effectually surprise them by " making the attack in the morning with our fred " troops, after theirs have been fatigued by watch

" ing in the night. And, besides, if among on " troops, there should chance to be some whole

" courage is but inconfiderable, the night favour " their timidity; but, in the day, the eye of the mo" narch will inspire courage, and raise them about "themselves." The king was persuaded by the argument

II

| b

1 ité

eld

ht

db wit fan (far

ko

the ene look is 22 rand

figh

at an

whid

delir

sped

ight

m by

frel

vatch

g 00

whole

avout

e mo

abon

ment

guments of Vauban, though they were contrary the opinions of Louvois, and five marshals of rance.

At nine in the morning, the two companies of usqueteers, one hundred grenadiers, a battalion fine guards, and one of the regiment of Picardy, nounted, on all sides, upon this great crown-tork. Their orders were only to lodge themselves nit; to do which was considered as a great deal: of some of the black musqueteers having found means to penetrate as far as the interior intrenchment within this work, they immediately made hemselves masters of it. The grey musqueteers to into it at the same time another way, and were followed by the battalions of the guards. The beliged were pursued, and several of them killed; and the musqueteers letting down the draw-bridge, with the enemy from one intrenchment to another, both mer the little branch and grand stream of the Scheld; bthat the musqueteers were got into the city, and e de he guards very near being so, before the king iers g th new whether they had taken the first work they ad been ordered to attack.

But this is not what appears the most extraorditarvin this action. It was to be apprehended, that acompany of young musqueteers, flushed with the giour of success, would fall indiscriminately upon be garifon and inhabitants, which they might meet in the streets; and that either they would themkires be overpowered, or the city be plundered by ten: but these young men, being commanded by acornet, named Moissac, ranged themselves in ordebehind fome carts; and while the other troops were coming up, and forming themselves without recipitation or disorder, others of the musqueteers least upon the neighbouring houses, from whence,

ace,

cked

afte

ent

at ci

Mag

: Cr

ag c

Th

an t rail

ter

nes,

end

of

Lu

my

mm dicio

hat ck v

ere :

de a

pro

cy :

dina

7 80

the

ner

oth

468

by their fire, they protected those who were in the fire freets: and thus every thing was done with green neint regularity: hostages were given on both sides; the town-council assembled; and deputies were fent; the king: and all this was done without plunder ing, confusion, or faults of any kind. The kin made the garifon prisoners of war; and entere Valenciennes, aftonished at being the master of i The fingularity of this action is what has engage us in this detail.

He had also the glory of taking Ghent in for days, and Ypres in feven. These were the action which he atchieved himself; and his successes b his generals were still greater.

Indeed, the marshal duke de Luxembourg, a first, suffered Philipsbourg to be taken in his sight endeavouring in vain to fuccour it with an armyo fifty thousand men. The general, who too Philipsbourg, was Charles V. the new duke of Lor rain, the heir to his uncle Charles IV. and, like him, divested of his territories. He had all the good qualities of his unfortunate uncle, without hi He long commanded the Imperial armie with glory; but, notwithstanding the taking of Philipsbourg, and though he was at the head of fixty thousand men, he was never able to regain possession of his territories. He in vain displayed upon his standards the words, Aut nunc, aut man quam ; Now, or never : for the marshal de Crequi, being released from his imprisonment, and become more prudent by his defeat at Consarbruck, constantly baffled all his attempts to enter Lorrain. He defeated him in the little combat of Kokersberg in Alsaces. He harrassed and fatigued him continually; took Fribourgh in his Sight, and, some time f March 25. 1678. · March 9. 1678.

h Nov. 14. 1677. 5 October 7. 1677. after,

th

nt t

der

kin

ere

fi

age

for

ion

mie g o ad o

egain

layer nun

come

COD rain

sberg ntinu-

e time

after,

er, again defeated a detachment of his army at heinfeld!. He passed the river Kim in his prethe nee, pursued him towards Offenbourg, and atcked him in his retreat; and, having immediareafter taken the fort of Kehl, sword in hand, he ent to burn the bridge of Strasbourg, by which atcity, which was still free, had so often given a fige to the Imperial arms. Thus the marshal Grequi repaired the temerity of one day, by a og course of success, due only to his prudence; d, if he had lived, would, perhaps, have aciel a reputation equal to that of Turenne.

The prince of Orange was not more fortunate as the duke of Lorrain: he was not only forced raise the siege of Maestricht and Charleroi, but, ght her having seen Cond, Bouchain, and Valencines, subjected to the power of Lewis XIV. he, took endeavouring to succour St. Omer, lost the battof Montcassel, against Monsieur. The marshals like Luxembourg and d'Humieres commanded the the my under Monsieur; and it is said, that an error, at his ministed by the prince of Orange, joined to a ticious movement made by Luxembourg, were tat gained the victory. Monfieur began the atit with a courage and presence of mind, which me not in the least expected in a prince so essemiprove that courage is not incompatible with deliequi, ky and refinement: for the prince, who was alof always dreffed like a woman, who had the dinations of that fex, who lay in the same nightwhich they wear, and who painted and patched they do; upon this occasion, behaved like a neral, and a foldier. It is faid, the king, his other was somewhat jealous of his glory. It is tain, he faid but little to him on occasion of his

i July 1678. Vol. I.

wictory; and even did not go to look at the fi of battle, though he was just by it. Some Monsieur's servants, who were more penetrat than the others, upon this occasion, told him, the would never more command the army: a they were not mistaken in their prediction.

The taking of so many towns, and the gain of so many battles in Flanders, and in Germa were not the only successes of Lewis XIV. in twar. The marshalde Navailles defeated the so miards in the Lampourdan: and they were attack even in Sicily.

Sicily, ever fince the time of the tyrants of racuse, under whom it had at least been conside as something in the world, has always been us the dominion of foreigners: they have been a cessively subjected to the Romans, the Vandals, Arabs, the Normans under vassalage to the post the French the Germans, and the Spaniards: they have almost always hated their masters; volted from them, without making any laud efforts to regain their liberty; and continually cited seditions only to exchange their setters.

The magistrates of Messina had lighted up flames of civil war against their governors, and called France to their assistance. Their port blocked up by a Spanish sleet; and they were duced to the extremities of famine.

The chevalier de Valbelle came first to their lief with a few frigates; with which he vent through the Spanish fleet, and brought provise troops, and arms, into Messina. After him duke de Vivonne arrived, with seven men of of sixty guns, two of eighty, and several siresh with which he deseated the enemy's sleet, and tered Messina in triumph*.

h. I

Spa

imp

utch

e se

nyde

twe

ips (

And

ion

e fle

e un

ke d

na, i

oght

rces

ho, erit;

d wa uipp and,

s w

off in pear rit

dy an

e gar

e ene

Wour

e is o

the g

bin-b

or is eater paferro

k February 9. 1675.

Spain, for the defence of Sicily, was now forced implore the affiftance of her antient enemies the utch, who were always regarded as the masters of e fea. Ruyter failed with fuccours from the nyderzee, through the streights of Gibraltar; and, twenty Spanish vessels, joined twenty-three large ips of war.

ne

rat

, 1

: 3

ain

ma

in t

e S

tac

of

fide

un

en l

als,

por

S:

rs;

aud ally

цр

and

ort

were

their

vent

ovific

him

n of

iresh

and

And now the French, who formerly, in conjunion with the English, had not been able to defeat effects of Holland alone, gained the victory over emited fleets of Spain and the republic 1. ke de Vivonne being obliged to continue in Mefa, to pacify the people, who were already diffafed with their defenders, suffered this battle to be oght by Duquene, lieutenant general of the naval nes: he was a man as fingular as Ruyter, and to, like him, had obtained command by force of trit; but he had never yet commanded a fleet. d was hitherto rather distinguished for his skill in upping one. But whoever once gets the comand, having the genius requisite in his art, will s with rapidity, and without difficulty, from the offinconfiderable to the greatest things. Duquene peared a great commander even against Ruyter: tit was certainly shewing himself such to gain yan inconsiderable advantage over this admiral. gave battle a second time to the two fleets of tenemy near Agousta; wherein Ruyter received wound, which put an end to his glorious life." is one of those men, whose memory is still held the greatest veneration in Holland. He had, at been nothing more than a common ship or bin-boy; and for this he was the more respected: is the name of the princes of Nassau held in taler estimation than his. The council of Spain aferred upon him the title and patent of a duke;

Jan. 8. 1676.

m March 12. 1676.

mel

the

oul

urs

dr

all

ly a

Wa

ecto

uffi.

eigh d he

eran

77 ays (

edia

n, b

v no

bitra

ewis

ade l idf (

: 10

intec

ral,

His a

ming

1 W3

netion

d onl

The

Toure

their

the !

the U

a dignity which was foreign and frivolous to a publican. But these patents did not arrive till at his death; and the children of Ruyter, who we worthy of their father, refused that title; the a quisition of which is so ardently desired in month chies, but which is not preserable to the title of good citizen.

Duquene, the Ruyter of France, attacked two fleets a third time after the death of the Du admiral, and funk, burnt, and took, feveral of the The marshal duke de Vivonne had command in chief in this engagement; but it Duquene, nevertheless, who obtained the victor Europe, with aftonishment, beheld France become on a sudden, as formidable by sea as at land. H indeed, these armaments, and these victor es, a ferved to alarm the nations round. The king England, who had commenced the war for the terests of France, was at last upon the point of tering into a league with the prince of Orange, had espoused his niece. The glory acquired in cily, was the price of too great treasures; and French, at last, evacuated Messina at the very t when it was generally believed they would m themselves masters of the whole island. Lewis X was highly blamed for having commenced en prizes in this war, without carrying them through and for having abandoned Messina, as well as h land, after the acquisition of useless victories.

However, to have no other misfortune than of not preferving all his conquests, was certa to be very formidable. His enemies, in every of Europe, selt the extent of his power. War in Sicily had cost him much less than it cost Spain, which was exhausted and defeated all places. He raised new enemies against the host Austria; he fomented the troubles in Hungary and his embassadors at the ottoman Port we

earne

oai

ll af

W ne : non

e o

ed

Du fth

ad

it v icto

of

ry ti

m s X

en

roug

as H

S.

nan

erta

ery

it

eate

he bo

nga

rt We earn

nest in their endeavours to make the Turks carthe war into Germany, notwirhstanding he mid imfelf, to fave appearances, fend some sucus against the Turks, whom policy excited him draw into the empire. He was alone superior all his enemies: for Sweden, which was his lyally, was engaged in nothing but an unfuccefiwar against the elector of Brandenbourg. This eftor, who was the father of the first king of usia, began to gain his country a power and ight, which has fince been greatly increased; the, at that time, deprived the Swedes of Porania. It is remarkable, that, in the course of icto is war, conferences for a peace were almost al-econ ays open; at first at Gologne, by the ineffectual diation of Sweden; and afterwards at Nimein was a ceremony almost as vain as the pope's the biration in the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle; for dehisproposals on the 9th of April 1678. in the ift of his conquests, and gave his enemies till and toth of May, to accept of them. He also toted a farther time of fix weeks to the states genl, who submissively begged it of him.

His ambition was no longer turned towards Hol-This republic had been so fortunate, or so ming, as no longer to appear but as an auxiliary Iwar, which had been commenced for her deoftion. The Empire and Spain, who at first only been auxiliaries, at last became the prin-le parties concerned.

The king, in the conditions which he imposed, foured the commerce of the Dutch: he restored them Maestricht, and also gave up some towns the Spaniards, which were to serve as a barrier the United Provinces; such as Charleroi, Cour-

I 3

1. I

Wh

col

dari

ient

Fin

nd an ibou

W

No

ribec

law

e du

e cor If;

Impi itho

ortun

SOW Du

ays a

ewe

ad in ad in

gnin eft f

ined

f Or

lal's ate, a

e pr

tich

tho o

parsh

Hed :

rai, Oudenarde, Ath, Ghent, and Limbourg: he reserved Bouchain, Condé, Ypres, Valencien Cambrai, Maubeuge, Aire, Saint Omer, Cal Charlemont, Popering, Bailleul, &c. which. together, made a considerable part of Flande and to which he also added Franche-Comté, wh he conquered twice: and these might be consider as a sufficient compensation for the toil and expe of the war.

From the Empire he only defired Frihourg Philipsbourg, and left the choice to the emper He caused the two brothers Furstemberg to ber stated in their estates, and the bishoprick of St bourg, of which they had been deprived by emperor, and one of them imprisoned. Swed which had always continued firmly attached France, was to reap great advantages by this trea in particular, a part of Pomerania, which she lost, was to be ceded by the elector of Brand bourg to the king of Sweden.

In regard to Lorrain, he offered to re-estab the new duke Charles V, therein: but he infi on being master of Nancy, and all the great roa

These conditions, tho' prescribed with the hau tiness of a conqueror, were not, however, for reasonable as to make his enemies desperate, compel them, as a last effort, to re-unite ag him: he dictated to Europe in an authorita manner : but, at the same time, he acted with dence and good policy.

In the conferences at Nimegen, he found me to excite jealoufy among the allies. The D were extremely desirous to sign the treaty, withstanding the prince of Orange, who was continuing the war at any rate. The Dutch alle that, in case they did not sign, the Spaniards too weak to affift them.

When the Spaniards saw the Dutch had accepted conditions of peace, they accepted them also ; daring, that the Empire did not exert itself sufiently in the common cause.

Finally, the Germans, being abandoned by Hol-ad and Spain, signed the treaty last; relinquishing bourg to the king, and confirming the treaties Westphalia.

:1

ien

Caf

ch,

nde wh

fide xpe

arg

per

oe re

St by

aga

orita ith |

d me D

No alterations were made in the conditions preribed by Lewis XIV. and Europe received both laws and its peace from his hands; except only eduke of Lorrain, who rejected a treaty, which considered as odious and dishonourable to him-is; and rather chose to be a fugitive prince in the

by If; and rather chose to be a fugitive prince in the med impire, than a sovereign in his own dominions, in thout honour or power. He hoped for a better trea mune from the event of time, and the effect of the sown courage and constancy.

During the conferences at Nimegen, and four many after the plenipotentiaries of France and Holestab and had signed the peace, the prince of Orange in the med Lewis XIV. What a dangerous enemy he may alin him. The marshal de Luxembourg, who have alinvested Mons, received information of the solid single of this treaty; after which he went in pertent the same with the intendant of the army. The prince and with the intendant of the army. The prince ined with the intendant of the army. Orange, with all his forces, attacked the maral's quarters; which he forced, and a long, obstiate, and bloody engagement ensued; from which prince, with reason, expected to gain a distin-pished victory: for he not only made the attack, was the confided in the security of the treaty. The alle surshal de Luxembourg, with great difficulty, reds to the led: and whatever advantage was gained in this Wagement, was in favour of the prince of Orange;

ile of

nd o

hould

e ve

rnam

backi

f Le

at O

Henry

is de

nd thi

f Co

aly u

he es

rom t

alled

erved

lifting

ay ti

reat

now

whole

of Le

emag

Title

are i

arrie

e ad

for his infantry remained masters of the field battle.

Did the ambitious fet a value upon the blood others, the prince of Orange would not have ma this attack. He undoubtedly knew, that the pea was figned, or foon would be; and he knew, the this peace was advantageous to his country : new thelefs, he endangered his own life, and the lin of many thousand men, as the first fruits of ag neral peace, which was fo far advanced, that could not have prevented it, even by defeatingt French. The action, which appeared great, b was certainly very inhuman, and was more a mired than blamed at that time, produced none article of peace, and cost the lives of two thousa French, and as many of the enemy, in vain. ! this peace it appeared how intirely projects are d concerted by events. Holland, against whom on the war had been undertaken, and which was have been destroyed, lost nothing by it; and, the contrary, gained a barrier: but all the oth powers, who had protected it from destruction were losers.

The king was now at the height of glory a greatness. He had been victorious ever since hegan to reign; had never besieged any place with our taking it; had shewn himself superior, upon all occasions, to his enemies united; had been the terror of Europe for ten years together; was at laits arbitrator and peace-maker; and therein added Franche-Comté, Dunkirk, and half of Flanders to his own dominions: but what should be considered as the greatest of his honours, is, that he was king over a people who were happy at that time, and were the model of other nations. The hotel de ville of Paris, in 1680, which was some time after the conclusion of this peace, applied the

bd

liv

g

t l gt

at la

nders confi nat h at the

The

title

de of Creat to him, in the most solemn manner : ad ordered, that, for the future, that title only hould be used in all public monuments. Soon after na ne year 1673. some medals had been cast with this mame; and Europe, tho' jealous, did not refuse the packnowlege the honour. Nevertheless, the name the Lewis XIV. has prevailed in the world over at of Great. All things are governed by custom. lenry, who was so justly surnamed the Great after is death, is now commonly called Henry IV. dthis sufficiently distinguishes him. The prince f Condé is always called the great Condé, not f Condé is always called the great Condé, not ally upon account of his heroic actions, but from the ease of distinguishing him by this surname and the ease of distinguishing him by this surname alled Condé the Great, he would not have prevented the title. We say the great Corneille, to on listinguish him from his brother: but we never say the great Virgil, the great Homer, nor the reat Tass. Alexander the Great is no longer oth mown but by the name of Alexander. Charles V. Stio whose successes were more distinguished than those of Lewis XIV. never had the title of great. Charles y at emagne is now only considered as a proper name. Titles are of no consequence to posterity; and the with the name of a man, who has done great things, upon arries more respect than all the epithets that can are the added to it. eadded to its en th

I 5

CHAP.

CHAPTER XIII.

The taking of Strasbourg; the bombardin of Algiers; the submission of the G noese; the embassy from Siam; the pope humbled; and the electorate of Cologne disputed.

THIS general peace did not restrain the am tion of Lewis XIV. The Empire, Spain, a Holland, disbanded their extraordinary troops: Lewis kept all his; and made the season of pea a time for conquests. He was then so certain his power, that he established jurisdictions in Me and Briffac, to re-unite all those territories to. crown, which might formerly have depended up Alface, or the three bishopricks; but which, fro time immemorial, had been under other maste Many princes of the Empire, the elector Palatin and the king of Spain himself, who were possess of some bailiwicks in this country, were cited appear before the chambers which were established to render homage to the king of France, or to hold the confiscation of their possessions. Noprin fince the time of Charlemagne, had actad fo mu like a master, and a judge, among fovereigns, conquered countries by arrets, like Lewis XIV

The elector Palatine, and the elector of Treve were divested of the seigniories of Falkembour Germarsheim, Veldentz, &c. and it was in we they made complaints to the Empire, in the affer bly at Ratisbon: for that assembly contented in with making protestations.

It was not sufficient for the king to have the prefecture of ten free cities of Alsace, under the san

was hine fitfe

ch. 1

tle b

hefe d

anno Lou his pl

rigues nany strasb

t oncorts,

ulted gates, der. I who v tent a by the

ions 1

The oward the aid he condition its continuous c

He, of Cal who, i

*

in

G

th

ml

, al

pea

in

M

0.

up

fro

fte

atin

Teff

ed |

ifh

to.b

rin

mu

, 1

(IV

reve

n v

asse

d itt

e fan

till

tle by which the emperor had held them: for now hey no longer dared to talk of liberty in any of hele cities. Strasbourg still preserved its freedom: was a large and rich city, was mistress of the hine by means of its bridge over that river, and, sitself, formed a powerful republic, famous for sarsenal, which contained nine hundred pieces of annon.

Louvois had long conceived a design to subject isplace to his mafter. Money, menaces, and inigues, by which he had opened the gates of fo any towns, prepared Louvois an entrance into trasbourg. The magistrates were corrupted; and te people were astonished to behold their ramparts tonce furrounded by 20,000 French troops; their orts, which defended them upon the Rhine, inilted and taken in an instant; Louvois at their ates, and their burgomasters talking of a surrener. The prayers, tears, and despair of the citizens, who were enamoured of their liberties, did not preent a treaty for a furrender from being proposed. y the magistrates, nor Louvois from entering beir city the same day. Vauban, by the fortificaions with which he afterwards surrounded it, reneted it the strongest barrier of France.

The king did not behave with more ceremony owards Spain: in the Low Countries he demandthe town of Aloft, and all its bailiwick; which,
aid he, the ministers had forgot to insert in the conditions of peace: and Spain being dilatory in the compliance with this demand, he caused the ity of Luxembourg to be invested.

He, at the same time, purchased the strong town of Casal of the duke of Mantua; a perty prince; who, to defray the expences of his pleasures, would have sold all his territories.

^{*} September 30. 1681:

Ch.

drec

mai

out

the

Alg

of a

to

all

teri

wh

Th

gen

wh

an

Co

rit

ma

the

gu

W

to ide

his

evi

pe

m

in

pe

th

OU

W

ta

C

d

The alarm in Europe was revived, when he beheld Lewis XIV. thus extending his power of all fides, and gaining more in a time of peace that ten of his predeceffors had acquired in all thei wars. The Empire, Holland, and even Sweden, having taken umbrage at the king, entered into a alliance. The English menaced, the Spaniard seemed di posed for war, and the prince of Orange did his utmost to get it declared: but none of these powers, at that time, dared to strike the sin blow.

The king, who was already feared in all places thought of nothing but making himself still more dreaded. He, at last, raised his marine to a degree of force, which exceeded the hopes of France, and increased the sears of Europe. He had sixty thou sand sailors; and his regulations for their discipline which were as severe as those for the land-army kept all these rough and untrastable people within the bounds of their duty. Even the maritim powers, England and Holland, had neither so many sailors, nor such excellent laws. Companies of cadets in the frontier-towns, and marine guard in the ports, were instituted, and composed of young men, who were instructed in all the arts necessary in their profession, by masters who were paid at the public expence.

The port of Toulon, upon the Mediterranean, was constructed at an immense expence, in such a manner as to contain one hundred men of war, to gether with an arsenal, and very large and magnishent magazines. The port of Brest, upon the ocean, was formed upon as extensive a plan. Dunkirk and Havre-de-Grace, were filled with ships and Rochefort, in spite of nature, was made a place of trade and naval force.

In short, the king had upwards of one hundred ships of the line, several of which carried an hundred

13 n fh

r or

that

their

den

to an

iard

ang

ne o

e firf

aces

more

egre

, and

thou pline

rmy

itim

ma-

es o

uard d o

s newer

nean

r, to

gnifi.

000

Dua-

nips !

place

adred

hun-

dred

dred guns, and some even more: nor did they remain unactive in the ports; for squadrons were sent out under the command of Duquene, which cleared the seas, infested by the Corsairs of Tripoli and Algiers. He was revenged upon Algiers by means of a new art, the discovery of which was owing to that care which he took to excite the efforts of all the genius's of his age. This admirable; but terrible art, was that of bomb-veffels, by means of which maritime towns may be burnt to ashes. There was a young man, named Bernard Renaud, generally known by the name of Little Renaud, who, without having ever been in the fervice, was an excellent mariner through the strength of genius. Colbert, who distinguished merit, though in obscurity, had frequently called him to the council of the marine, even in the king's presence: and it was by the skill and care of Renaud, that a new, more regular, and easy method in the building of ships, was foon after practifed. He, in council, propoled to bombard Algiers with a fleet. We had then no idea how it was possible to fix mortars for the casting of bombs in any manner but upon folid ground : his proposal was therefore rejected; and he expetienced all that raillery and contradiction which every inventor must expect: but his continuing to perlift in his opinion, joined to that eloquence which men generally have, who are strongly prepossessed in favour of their opinions, determined the king to permit the experiment to be made.

Renaud directed five vessels to be built, smaller than the ordinary size, but stronger in wood, without decks, and with a false deck in the hold, upon which hollow places were made, in which the mortars were put. With this equipage he set sail, under the command of old Duquene, to whom the conduct of the enterprize was committed, and who did not expect any success from it: but Duquene

and

and the Algerines were assonished at the effect of the bombs. Part of the town was demolished; and consumed: but the art, which was afterwards carried into other nations, only served to multiply human calamities; and, more than once, became terrible to France, where it had been invented.

The marine, which was brought to this degree of perfection in a very few years, was the fruit of Colbert's care. Louvois, through a spirit of emulation, caused more than one hundred citadels to be fortissed. The fortresses of Huningen, Sar-Lewis, Mont-roial, &c. were constructed under his direction; and while the kingdom gained such great exterior strength, all the sine arts slourished at home, and the nation abounded in riches and pleasures. Foreigners came in crouds to admire the court of Lewis XIV. and his name was known in all themstions of the world.

His power and his glory were still more increased by the weakness of most of the other potentates. and by the misfortunes of their people. The emperor Leopold was at that time under apprehensions from the Hungarian rebels, but more particularly from the Turks; who, being called by the Hungarians to their affistance, were on the point of entering Germany. The policy of Lewis made him persecute the Protestants in France, because he thought he ought to render them incapable to hur him; but he secretly supported the Protestants in Hungary, because he thought they might be of lervice to him. His embassador at the Porte had presfed the armament of the Turks: and the Ottoman troops, to the number of two hundred thousand men, augmented also by the Hungarian forces, in their passage, found neither fortified towns, such as are in France, nor any number of troops capable to Ch.

opp

to t

thin

reti

they

ever

at th defe

tun e

I

Mul

WOL

pett

Imp

The

rible

I

bein who

WOU

of 1

Tur

tiati

Ror.

I

gene

Who

bloc

66 II

the .

" P

Thu

1

oppose their passage: so that they penetrated even to the gates of Vienna, after having ruined every thing in their passage.

The emperor Leopold, upon the approach of the Turks, quitted Vienna with precipitation, and retired to Lintz; and when he was informed, that they had invested Vienna, he sted still farther off, even as far as Passau, leaving the duke of Lorrain at the head of a little army, which had been already deseated by the Turks, to take such care of the formes of the Empire as he might.

It was univerfally believed, the grand visier Cara-Mustapha, who commanded the Ottoman troops, would soon make himself master of the weak and petty capital of Germany, which is regarded by the Imperialists as the capital of the Christian world. They were indeed, upon the brink of the most terrible revolution.

ube

ea

ne

cs

0

na.

led.

tes.

m

ons

arly

nga

ter

him

he

hurt

ts in

fer-

pref-

man

fand

ch as le to pose

Lewis XIV. with reason, expected that Germany, being ravaged by the Turks, and having a chief whose slight had increased the general consternation, would be obliged to have recourse to the protection of France. He had an army upon the frontiers of the empire, ready to defend it against these very Turks, whom he had brought thither by his negotiations: and thus he hoped to become the protector of the empire, and to make his son king of the Romans.

It was the master-piece of his politics to appear generous in the conduct of these great interests. When the Turks approached Vienna, he raised the blockade of Luxembourg. "I desire only to promote the happiness of Christendom," said he to the Spaniards; "and I will never attack a Christian prince when the Turks are in the empire, nor prevent Spain from succouring the emperor." Thus he reconciled his politics with his glory: but, tontrary to the universal expectation, Vienna was relieved.

t m

Dan

iers

ftl

vas

is I

onf

een

ent

gain

ave

ffer

and.

ir th

ain

he p

nent

ions

So

ours

orte

houg le of

rand Th

im st ad so

nd v.

as a

aunch

y chai

beir lit

relieved. The presumption of the grand visier and his brutal contempt of the Christians, proved his ruin. His delays gave time for the arrival of John Sobieski; who, being joined by the duke of Lorrain, had only to present himself before the Ottoman multitude, to put them in consustant under the shame of having quitted it: and made his entrance at the time when his deliverer was coming out of the church, where they had been singing Te Deum; and where the preacher, for his text, had taken these words: There was a man sent from God whose name was John. No monarch was ever more happy, of more humbled, than Leopold.

And now the king of France, having no longer any measures to observe, renewed his pretensions and recommenced his hostilities. He bombarded besieged, and took Luxembourg, Courtrai, and Dixmude, in Flanders. He seized upon Treves and demolished its fortifications; and all this, it was said, was to execute the treaties of Nimegen. The Imperialists and Spaniards negotiated with him a Ratisbon, while he was taking their towns; and the violated peace of Nimegen was changed into truce for twenty years; by which the king kep Luxembourg, and all its principality.

He was still more formidable upon the coasts of Africa, where the French, till then, had been known only from such of them as these barbarians had

Algiers, which was twice bombarded, sent deputies to beg pardon, and receive peace. They released all the Christian slaves, and also paid a sum of money; which is the severest punishment that can be inflicted on these consairs.

^{*} September 12, 1683.

Tunis and Tripoli made the same submissions. t may not be amiss here to take notice, that when all of the ships came into Aliers to deliver all the Christian slaves in the name fithe king of France, a great number of English as found among them; who being got on board is ships, insisted to Damfreville, that it was in consideration of the king of England that they had een set at liberty. Upon this, the French captain ent for the Algerines; and causing the English to be gain set on shore; These men, said he, pretend they we gained their freedom only in the name of their ing: mine, therefore, will not take the liberty to fer them his protection . I put them again into your nger ands, and you may now shew what regard you have with king of England. All these English were ain put in irons: and this action at once declared the pride of the English, the weakness of the governnent of Charles II. and the respect which all naions paid to Lewis XIV.

So great was this universal respect, that new hoours were granted to his embaffador at the Ottoman orte, such as those shewn to the sophy of Persia; wigh at the same time, he was humbling the peoe of Africa, who are under the protection of the

fier

e of the n ·

the

ance ut o um: held

ami , 0

ons.

ded

and

ves

wa

The

m a and

nto

kep

is o

OWI had

The republic of Genoa humbled itself before.

The Genoese in still more than that of Algiers. The Genoese alfold bombs and gunpowder to the Algerines; d were building four gallies for the service of lepu pain. The king, by his envoy, Saint Olon, who yre as a private gentleman, commanded them not to fun such those gallies, and menaced them with a speethat chastisement, in case of disobedience to his will. he Genoese, being incensed at this outrage upon thir liberties, and depending too much upon the stance of Spain, neglected to do what Lewis Fund IV. had ordered. Fourteen large ships, twenty-

Ch.

isfa E

in his

ofrec

beecl

by Se

and c

bejoi

and t

deur.

nelai,

baugh

the de

us, a

fore

what

bim

faille

tract

tere.

T

every

more

from

Were

isted.

logu

Euro

of an

Ber,

This

to m

Eagl

000

and h

gallies, ten bomb-vessels, and several frigates imme diately sailed out of the port of Toulon. Seig nelai, the new secretary of the marine, which em ployment his father, the famous Colbert, had made him exercise before his eeath, was himself on board This young man was full of ambition courage, spirit, and activity; was desirous to bea once both a general, and a minister; was anxiou for every kind of glory; sanguine in all his pursuis and mixed pleasures with his business in such a man ner as not to injure or neglect it. Old Duquen commanded the men of war, and the duke de Mon temar the gallies: but they were both obedient the fecretary of state. They arrived before Go noad; the ten galliots threw fourteen thousan bombs into the city, and reduced to an heap ruins part of those marble edifices, which have gained Genoa the furname of Proud. Four thou fand foldiers, being landed, advanced up to the gates of the city, and burnt the suburbs of St. Peter And now it became necessary for the Genoese to humble themselves, in order to preve a total ruin. The king insisted, that the doge Genoa, and four of the principal fenators, shou come and implore his clemency in his palace at Ve failles: and, to prevent the Genoese from eludia this satisfaction, or depriving him of any part his glory, he declared, that the doge, who hou be fent to beg his pardon, should be continued his dignity, notwithstanding that perpetual law Genoa, by which the doges are deprived of the dignity, whenever they absent themselves a mome from the city.

Imperialo Lescaro, doge of Genoa, with the se nators Lomelino, Garebardi, Durazzo, and Sal wago, came to Versailles to make the king such se

March 17, 1684.

tisfaction

13

me

eig

em.

ade

are

on e a

iou

lan

lor

t t

Ge San

pq

av

100

th

ete

th

vei

e

ou

Ve

dia

t

ou

d

W

th

me

e le

Sal

h

Cti

isfaction as he should require of them. The doge, in his ceremonial habit spoke, covered with a cap ofred velvet, which he frequently pulled off. beech, and his marks of submission, were dictated by Seignelai. The king gave him audience, feated and covered: but as, in all the actions of his life, bejoined politeness with dignity, he treated Lescaro, and the fenators, with as much goodness as grandeur. The ministers Louvois, Croissi, and Seignelai, behaved towards them with more pride and baughtiness: and this difference of behaviour made the doge fay; The king, by his manner of receiving us, deprives us of our liberty; but his ministers refire it. This doge was a man of great wit: and what he said, when the marquis de Seignelai asked him what he thought most extraordinary at Verfailles, is generally known: What appears most extracedinary to me, said Lescaro, is to see myself tere.

The extreme passion which Lewis XIV. had for trery thing which appeared with an éclat, was still more flattered by the embassy which he received from Siam; a country where, till that time, they were ignorant that such a kingdom as France exilled. It had happened, through one of those figular incidents which prove the superiority of the Europeans over other nations, that a Greek, the son of an innkeeper of Cephalonia, named Phalk Confance, was become barcalon, that is, prime miniher, or grand visier, of the kingdom of Siam. This man, in the design which he had conceived to make himself king, and in his want of foreign affifance, had not dared to confide either in the English or Dutch; because he considered them as to dangerous neighbours. The French had estawithed factories upon the coasts of Coromandel, and had carried their king's reputation into these estant regions of Asia. Constance regarded Lewis

Ch.

ope

mper

nd odeso

nd h Milan

kind.

Franc

ing co

cause

on all

emba.

dom :

very

Thefe

ed, re

all for ever (

fadors

comn

impo

At

the k

Engla

renou

Ducci

other

order

fied v

" ma

" fel!

" an

marqu

brave

188

XIV. as a person whose vanity he might flatter, by paying him an unexpected homage from fo diftan a place. Religion, which is made the universal tool of politics from pole to pole, ferved Constance upon this occasion. He sent a solemn embassy . in the name or his master the king of Siam, with very great presents, to Lewis XIV. and to give himto understand, that this Indian monarch, admiring the glory and splendor of his reign, would conclude no treaty but with the French nation; and even that he intended foon to become a Christian. The king glory being flattered, and his religion deceived, he was prevailed on to fend two embaffadors, and fa Jesuits, to the king of Siam; and to these he after wards added fom officers, with eight hundred fol But the éclat of the Siamele embaffy wa diers. the only fruit of it. Constance fell a victim to hi ambition, and the few French which remained about him were maffacred; others were obliged to fly and his widow, after having been on the point of becoming queen, was condemned, by the fuccesso of the king of Siam, to serve in his kitchen; for which employment the was born.

This thinst of glory, which excited Lewis XIV to distinguish himself in every thing from other monarchs, again appeared in the haughty behavious which he affected towards the court of Rome Odescalchi, the son of a banker in the Milanese, at that time possessed the papal dignity, under the name of Innocent XI. He was a man of virtue, and a good pope, though an indifferent theologian: and he was a courageous, firm, and magnificent prince. He succoured the Empire and Poland against the Turks with his money, and the Venetians with his gallies. He very highly condemned the conduct of Lewis XIV. for uniting with the Turks against the Christians. People were associated to behold a • 1684.

nce

ic ery

no

ha

15 h

er

ol

wa.

hi

ou

ly.

0

fo

fo

17

the

iou

me

am

nd i

and

nce

the

his

dud

ainf

ld a

ope

ope with such earnestness espouse the cause of the mperors, who call themselves kings of the Romans. nd would, if they could, reign in Rome. But Odescalchi was born under the Austrian dominion; nd had made two campaigns in the troops of the Custom and disposition govern man-Milanese. ind. His pride was piqued at the king; who, on is side, mortified him in every thing that a king of France is capable of towards a pope, without breaking communion with him f. An abuse had long rigned in Rome, which was difficult to co rect, betaule it was founded upon a point of honour, whereon all the catholic kings piqued themselves. Their embassadors at Rome extended their right of freedom and asylum, affected by all their masters, to a very great distance, which was called their quarters. These pretentions, which were constantly maintaind, rendered one half of Rome a certain asylum to Alforts of criminals. And by another abuse, whatever enter'd Rome under the name of the embasadors, never paid any duty. By this custom the commerce of the city suffered, and the state was impoverished.

At last, Innocent XI. prevailed on the emperor, the kings of Spain, Poland, and the new king of England, James II. who was a catholic prince, to tenounce these odious rights. The nuncio Ramounce proposed to Lewis XIV. to concur with the other kings in promoting tranquillity and good order in Rome. But Lewis, being greatly distaisfied with the pope, replied, "that he had never made the conduct of others an example to him"self; but on the contrary, would make himself an example to others." After this he sent the marquis de Lavardin as his embassador to Rome, to brave the pope. Lavardin entered Rome, not with-

f 1685, 1686, 1687, 1688.

Ch.

be la

vho

T

ers

rho

who ike i

ut v

dang

diffri

ons, ime,

electe

dinan

of fu

bas a electe

bim i

XI.

less t

ktting

flow

Bavar

king '

him c

the en

repose

nights

cond

nage.

ried (

rights

raile!

tracts

the ki

offenc

standing the pope's prohibition, escorted by for hundred marine guards, four hundred voluntes officers, and two hundred fervants, all armed. H took possession of his palace, his quarters, and the church of Saint Lewis, round which he posted cer tinels, who did regular duty, and were relieved the same manner as in a fortified place. The pop is the only fovereign to whom such an embelly a be fent: for the superiority which he affects or other crowned heads, always makes them defired to humble him; and, through the weakness of h state, he is always insulted with impunity. A that innocent X1. could do in opposition to the ma quis de Lavardin, was to employ his excommun cations; a fort of arms which are, indeed, as litt regarded at Rome as elsewhere; but which, never theless, through antient custom, are employed like the pope's foldiers, who bear arms only for the fall of form.

The cardinal d'Etrée, who was a man of wit, b was frequently an unfuccefsful negotiator, was, that time, charged with the affairs of France Rome. D'Etrée having been obliged frequent to see the marquis de Lavardin, could not after wards be admitted to an audience of the pop without first receiving absolution: and it was vain that he opposed it; for Innocent XI. persists in giving it to him, that he might still continue preserve that imaginary power, by continuing practife those customs on which it is founded.

Lewis, in the same authoritative manner, but a ways supported by the arts of policy, endeavoure to direct the choice of an elector of Cologne. H fole design being to oppose or divide the Empire he endeavoured to raise to this electorate the card nal de Furstemberg, bishop of Strasbourg, who wi his creature, and the tool of his interests, and wa an irreconcileable enemy to the emperor, who,

ou hi A

na

un

itt

761

lil

fal

ce

ent

after

pop

vas

rfiste

ve t

ing t

out a

oure

H

O W

the

telast war, had made him a prisoner, as a German ho had fold himself to the service of France.

The chapter of Cologne, like all the other chapers of Germany, has a right to nominate its bishop, tho, by that means, becomes elector. The person tho filled this see, was Ferdinand of Bavaria, who, he many other princes, had formerly been an ally, nt was now an enemy, to the king. He was very langerously ill: and, at that juncture, the king illributing his money very liberally among the caons, and using promises and intrigues at the same ime, he got the cardinal de Furstemberg to be defted as coadjutor; and, after the death of Fermand, he was elected a second time, by a plurality offuffrages. The pope, by the German concordat. has a right to confer the bishoprick upon the person defted, and the emperor has that of confirming him in the electorate. The emperor and Innocent II. being persuaded, that to let Furstemberg posless the electoral dignity, would, in a manner, be kting Lewis XIV. possess it, they united to behow this principality upon the young prince of Bavaria, brother of the deceased elector. ling was revenged upon the pope, by depriving him of Avignon ; and he prepared for war against the emperor. At the same time he disturbed the repose of the elector Palatine, upon occasion of the rights of Madame, the princess Palatine, and seand wife to Monsieur; which rights, by her marnage-contract, the had renounced. The war cartied on against Spain, in 1667. in favour of the ights of Maria-Therefa, notwithstanding a parallel renunciation, sufficiently proves, that contracts are designed only for private persons. pire the king, at the height of his glory and greatness, card offended, despoiled, or humbled, almost all the princes round him; but, at the same time, he als made almost all of them unite and conspire again him.

CHAPTER XIV.

King James dethroned by his fon-in-land William III. and protected by Lewi XIV.

THE prince of Orange, more ambitious that Lewis XIV. had formed vast designs, an fuch as might appear chimerical in a stadsholder Holland; yet these he carried into execution byh dexterity and courage. He was bent upon hun bling the French king, and intended to dethrone the king of England. Without great difficulty he, b degrees, formed a league in Europe against France The emperor, part of the Empire, Holland, at the duke of Lorrain, were the first who secret joined themselves at Augsbourg; and this allian was foon after strengthened by the accession Spain and Savoy. The pope, though he did n avow himself one of the confederates, yet by fecret practices, contributed not a little to forwa their designs. Venice favoured them also, thou the had not declared openly; and all the Itali princes were likewise in their interest. In the nor Sweden was then attached to the Imperialists; 2 Denmark, though an ally of France, incapable doing her any service. There were, at this jun ture, too, above six hundred thousand Protestan who had been obliged to flee from the perfecuti of Lewis. These having left their native coun carried along with them their riches, their industry and an implacable hatred against their king: when ever they fettled, they became an addition to t enem is Aigning

h. I

emic

d all Jame Eng

t Cha d of l

y, his ewn to ints o

aceable her has m his th the afuciu reign ms, the fe reput on of fi great d Con the Eliz hed this things acurrer James

urope in the

temair

emies of France, and greatly inflamed those wers already inclined to war. We shall speak of is flight of the protestants, in the chapter conming Religion. Thus the king was on all sides set with enemies; James being his only friend dally.

m th b

ret

an

n

d n

y t

wa loug talia

; 21

ole

iun

an

uti

un

uft

he

em

James succeeded his brother Charles II. as king England. They were both Roman Catholics: Charles never declared himself till towards the of his life, and even then intirely out of comfance to his mistresses and brother; for, in rea-, his only religion was deism. He had always wn the utmost indifference in those controverted ats of religion, which are apt to divide mand; and this contributed not a little to that aceable reign which he enjoyed. James, on the er hand, had been a bigot to the Romish church m his early years; and he espoused her cause the most extravagant zeal. Had he been a hometan, or had he followed the doctrine of afucius, the English would never have disturbed reign: but he designed to establish, in his kingns, the Roman Catholic religion; than which ing could be more detestable in the eyes of trepublican royalists, who accounted it the remof slaves. 'Tis sometimes, indeed, a matter of geat difficulty to change the religion of a coun-Constantine, Clovis, Gustavus Vasa, and mElizabeth, each by different methods, accomand this. But, in order to effect such alterations. things are absolutely requisite; deep policy, and nourrence of circumstances: by neither of which lames favoured.

Inettled him not a little to see so many princes arope reigning with a despotic sway: those of then and Denmark had lately too become absorbin short, England and Poland were now the remaining kingdoms where the liberty of the strength. I.

people and monarchy subsisted together. Let XIV. encouraged him to aim at absolute power and the Jesuits pushed him on to re-establish their ligion. He accordingly endeavoured to car these points; but every step he took was so unf tunate or unpolitic, that he only inflamed the wh At his first fetting out, he acted as if had already accomplished his purposes; enterta ing publicly at his court the pope's nuncio, openly encouraging the Jesuits and Capuchin frie putting in prison the English bishops, whom should rather, if possible, have gained over to en a interest; taking away the privileges of the city London, which he ought rather to have increal and, in an arbitrary manner, trampling upon owever laws, which he should rather have secretly un mined: in short, his whole conduct was soin creet, that the cardinals of Rome humorously. that they ought to excommunicate him as a who was going to destroy that little of the " tholic religion which remained in England Pope Innocent XI. had not the least hopes i James's projects; and condinal's cap, which he folicited for father Peters and confessor. This Jesuit was a man of a forward ing ti impetuous disposition; he had flattered his mine to be the thoughts of being a cardinal, and mine to order to gratify ambition, pushed on his master to the utmol tremities. The heads of the nation, being reso to defeat the king's designs, formed themselves duke a secret confederacy: they sent a deputation to a favor prince of Orange; and all their measures were ducted with so much discretion and secrecy, the court had not the least suspicion.

A fleet, sufficient to contain fourteen or f thousand men, was accordingly fitted out by prince of Orange; who, at this juncture, cou

onfi ink ouf cy, rest,

le be l ad ined iven

rance en a

ho at

prove ing un en to

lowed w his

famo James

thfandi 1 joined midered only as a private person, of an illustrious ty, that the states general were devoted to his ingest, and their navy and treasure at his command. It became, indeed, a king in Holland, by his skilladdress; whilst James, by a precipitate conduct, ined himself in his own kingdom. It was at first iren out, that this fleet was designed against the face; and the secret was nk; for his yearly income was fcarce five hundred ndred persons. Barillon, the French embassador en at London, a man of pleasure, and better firs of Europe, was first deceived. Lewis, wever, was not: he offered fuccour to his ally, ho at first refused it, from a notion of his secuy, James soon after solicited his assistance; but proved then too late, the prince of Orange's fleet ing under fail: every thing failed him at once, en to his reason and understanding. His ships lowed those of the enemy to pass them; so that w his only resource was to defend himself by M his only relource was to detend himler by

Id. His army confifted of twenty thousand men:

I he led them immediately to battle, without ing time for reflection, in all probability they wild have fought; but he left them leisure to de mine themselves; and, accordingly most of the infossicers deserted him. Amongst these was estamous Churchill, as fatal afterwards to Lewis lames; who became so illustrious under the title duke of Marlborough. He had been a parti last favourity of Lames; and owed to him all his ers ard hit nd tify nof res lves nt favourite of James; and owed to him all his motion: his own sister was the king's mistress, ere he himself was his lieutenant-general; yet, not-, th Manding all this, he quitted his royal mafter, joined the prince of Orange. The prince of r fi by

o ty

n

in y i

ne

lat SI

12

cou

1668.

Denmark, James's son-in-law, nay even his on daughter the princess Anne, forsook him also.

Being thus attacked and persecuted by one for in-law, and abandoned by the other, his two date ters, as well as his intimate friends, having become his enemies, and being hated by his subjects, held into the utmost despair, and betook himself flight; the last resource of a prince when co quered; but he had recourse thereto without strik ing a fingle stroke. He was stopt, however, in flight by the populace, who behaved to him ve difrespectfully, and conducted him back to London In short, after having received the orders of t prince of Orange in his own palace, after havi feen his own guards turned out to make room those of another, being driven from his own hou and made a prisoner at Rochester, after such us he thought it most eligible to quit his kingdo and feek refuge in France.

This was the true æra of English liberty: I nation, represented by its parliament, now fixed so long contested bounds betwixt the prerogat of the crown, and the rights of the people: the prescribed the terms of reigning to the prince Orange, and chose him for their sovereign, in conjunction with his consort Mary, James's daught Henceforth this prince was acknowledged in greatest part of Europe, as William III. law king of England, and accounted the deliverer of nation; but, in France, he was only stiled prince of Orange, and looked upon as the usurper of father-in-law's dominions.

The fugitive prince, with his queen, the duke Modena's daughter, and the prince of Wales, yet an infant, accordingly implored the protect of Lewis XIV. The queen of England, who on. I opressi perfo red b lendo

ofuli

but I and a fSt. C uch g r luxuresents

ad the alet a

Jame tated a had pence

og's o twever tparat his ref ade a f sh at c she the st Jefui

e Sair relf: ras ce an he

othis sof f eptible

ve do

ou

16

do

d

gat

th

ace a co

ght

aw

of

pri

of I

ake

es,

o ri

red before her husband , was astonished at the lendor of the French court, and that magnificent ofusion which she beheld at Versailles: above all, was struck with the grandeur of her own recepm. Lewis himself conducted her to Chatou, thus pressing himself on the occasion: " The office I perform at present, Madam, is a sorrowful one; but I hope foon to do you others more important and agreeable." He went with her to the castle St. Germain, where she was entertained with as och grandeur as if she had been queen of France; ing supplied with every thing which convenience luxury could require, and having many noble esents given her in gold and silver plate, jewels, d the richest stuffs: she found likewise upon her ilet a purse of ten thousand Lewis-d'ors.

James, who arrived next day after his queen, was rated also with the same respect and magnificence: had fix hundred thousand livres settled for the pence of his houshold, and was attended by the g's officers and guards. All this pomp appeared, werer, but inconsiderable, compared with the marations made to re-establish him in his kingdom. disreflected great glory on Lewis; but James dea sorry figure, his reputation being very low, that court, and in the city, amongst those who the characters of others. He saw nobody lesuits, and often alighted at their houses in the Saint-Antoine. He told them he was a Jesuit felf: and though this may feem extraordinary, ras certainly a fact; for, by his own command, to he was duke of York, he had been initiated othis order by four English Jesuits. Such meanof foul in a prince, and the manner in which had lost his crown, made him appear in so conspible a light, that the courtiers often amused.

· January 1689.

Ch. Ic

themselves with making songs at his expence; that he became the general subject of ridicule France: nor did his being a Roman Catholic foff the farcasms thrown out against him: the archbish of Rheims, brother of Louvois, faid aloud, in drawing-room at St. Germains, "There's a simp " ton, who has thrown away three kingdoms for " mass." From Rome he received nothing indulgences and pasquils. His religion, in sho was of so little service to him, that when the prin of Orange, the head of the Calvinists, set fail on expedition for England, the Spanish embassador the Hague ordered mass to be performed for faccels.

Amidst these distresses of this exiled prince, the many kindnesses conferred on him by Le XIV. it may not be unworthy of our attention fee James touching for the king's-evil at the l English convent; the kings of England either fuming this wonderful power from a rightt pretended to the crown of France, or that it been a ceremony established since the reign of ! ward I.

Lewis made all possible dispatch to fend Ja over to Ireland, where there were a formidable dy of Roman Catholics in his interest. A flee thirteen ships of the first rate was accordingly si out at Brest, and all the officers, courtiers, priests, who had come to attend him at St. 9 mains, were conducted thither at Lewis's expe Mr. d'Avaux, being named embaffador to the throned prince, followed him with great pomp. fleet was furnished with plenty of arms and am nition; and there was likewise put on board ordin and rich furniture of all forts: Lewis himfelf wed take his leave of James at St. Germains; and, ing given him his coat of mail as his last present, embraced him, with these words: " The best this 66 I C mo nd, othe ith : er th > uadr h Ac I the ook fe > nd th er the and. Soo

> Toulo

ed the ips. er his Dutch got e Chatea Mingu ourage hich h and om u tehoc aly de bled, emfel the '

in such ears. med : heach

May

oft

np for ho

rit

n

o

10

Le

on

e li

er

t t it

Jai

leet fi

s,

. 0

pend

the c

p. T

amt

rdin

d, ha

ent, thi

I

I can wish you, is, that I may never see you more." No fooner had James landed in Iread, with these forces, than he was followed by other fleet of three-and-twenty men of war, in a considerable number of transport-ships, unr the command of Chateau Renaud d. This nadron having, in the passage, met with an Engh fleet, forced it to sheer off, and then landed the forces in fafety. In their return, they okseven merchant-ships, belonging to the Dutch; d thus arrived again at Brest, victorious oothe English, and loaded with the spoils of Holand.

Soon after, there was a third embarkation at Breft, Toulon, and Rochefori . The ports of Ireland, d the Channel, were now covered with French ips. Tourville, the French admiral, having unthis command seventy-two ships, fell in with a luch and English fleet of fixty sail; and a desperate intensued, which lasted ten hours f. Tourville, Inteau Renaud, d'Etrées, and Nemond, greatly dinguished themselves on this occasion: by their tunge and skill France procured an honour to hich the had not been accustomed; for the Engand Dutch, hitherto lords of the ocean, and on whom the French had but lately learned the athod of fighting at fea in line of battle, were utby defeated; seventeen of their ships, being difled, were partly stranded, and partly burnt, by imselves: the remainder of the seet took refuge. the Thames, or amongst the banks of Holland. hus what Lewis had so ardently defired for twenty ears, and what appeared so improbable, now hapand; the late victory, which had not cost the teach one ship, having procured him the empire went

K 4

Ch.

hither

lour ;

tremo

man.

graze

was r

news

becon at the

Humi

prince

city,

in Lo

on the

the kin

rate ze

to infe

the au

gant tr

procee

excited

ians, l

ncom

attenti

imes,

roduc

ower p

ll he

tom b bey u

ad be

erals :

lory t

ad tho

the e

nem y

rince,

joicii

of the fea; an empire, however, which proved h of short duration. It must be owned, indeed, the the enemy's ships at present fled before his triump ant fleets. Soon after, Seignelai, a bold enterp fing minister, ordered to sea a number of galli from Marseilles: and this was the first time the En lish coasts were visited by these vessels; by mea of which the French made a descent at Tinmout and destroyed, in the bay, above thirty merchan ships. The privateers of St. Malo's and Dunk were continually taking prizes; doing great ferv thereby to the public, and enriching themselve In fhort, for two years, the French were fole ma ters at fea.

But though Lewis had been fo prosperous in undertakings, James could not boast of success Ireland. He had with him about fix thousa French, and fifteen thousand Irish; the Boyne ru ning betwixt his army and that of king Willia This river was fordable, being under the heighton man's shoulders : but, after passing this, the ener must also have marched over a morass, next to whi there was a rifing ground, which formed a natu intrenchment. King William, having forded river with his army in three different places, ga The Irish, who shew themselves bravest foldiers in France and Spain, have always behaved at home shamefully. Amongst nation fome feem, as it were, formed to be under the fu jection of others: the English have always had Superiority over the Irish in genius, as well as an and riches; nor has Ireland ever been able to ha off the yoke, fince the was first subdued by an En lish baron. The French fought at the battle of Boyne; the Irish fled; and James, their so reign, without once heading them, or the Fren was the first who quitted the field. This monat

E July 1690.

hither

hitherto had always given proofs of the highest valour; but there are certain occasions when a kind of remor seizes the spirits, and enervates the whole man. King William, who had had his shoulder gazed by a cannon-bullet before the engagement, was reported, in France, to be dead. news was received at Paris with a shameful and unecoming transport. The populace and citizens. a the instigation of some inferior magistrates, made Huminations; they rung their bells; they burnt the prince of Orange in effigy, in several parts of the ity, in the fame manner as the pope is often burnt London; nay, they even fired the Bastille guns on the occasion. This, however, was not done by he king's orders; but was owing to the inconsiderate zeal of an inferior officer. One may be apt oinfer, from these demonstrations of joy, and from heauthority of so many writers, that this extravagant transport, at the pretended death of an enemy. proceeded from that excessive fear which he had excited; for all the French, as well as foreign histo-ians, have considered these rejoicings as the highest acomium on king William: yet, if we consider mentively the circumstances and character of those ines, we shall find that it was not fear which roduced those extravagancies: the citizens, and ower people, have no notion of dreading an enemy he threatens their city: nay, fo far were they om being terrified at the name of William, that by unjustly held him in the utmost contempt. He had d been almost always worsted by the French geari trals: nor were the common people sensible of the bry this prince had acquired even in his defeats; En d tho he had conquered James in Ireland, yet, of the eyes of the French, he did not appear an for emy worthy of Lewis XIV. Paris adored her en ince, and believed him invincible; fo that these joicings were not the effect of fear, but haired. her

K 5

s Sa

ru

0 en vhi

atu

d

ga

S

lwa

tion

e fu

Ch.

thou

here

ries

ganf

of tv

cours

ginee

maso

twen

with

faffic.

fions,

Lime

the pl

expe

lame

ed.

over

foldie

T

all the

for th

again:

moth

adesc

They

burg

port-f

brty-

toalt i

fom

As th

dift,

puted

a firf

bout

was a

Hollar

The Parisians, having most of them been born under the reign of Lewis, and inured to the yoke of absolute monarchy, esteemed a king as a divinity and looked upon an usurper as a sacrilegious villain. The lower class of people, who had often seen James go to mass, conceived an affection for hin as a pious prince, whilst they detested William as a heretic. The idea of a son-in-law and daughter who had driven their father into exile, of a Protessant reigning in the room of a Catholic, and, in short, of an enemy of Lewis XIV. had transported the Parisians to a pitch of phrensy; but wise people were more moderate in their sentiments.

James, having returned to France, left his rive to gain new victories in Ireland, and to establishimself more firmly on his throne. Lewis's sleet were now employed in bringing over the French who had fought to no purpose, as well as grean numbers of Irish families, who, living but poor in their own country, chose rather to go over

France to live on the king's bounty.

We may easily perceive, that fortune had be little share in the beginning or end of this revolution; since every part of it may be accounted for from the different characters of James and William. Those who discover the causes of event in the different conduct of men, will here observe that king William, after his victory, proclaimed general pardon: and that James, after his defeat passing through the little town of Galway, ordered some of the inhabitants to be hanged, becauthey had been for shutting the Gates against him Of two men, whose conduct was so different, it easy to see which would prevail.

James had yet some towns remaining in Ireland amongst others was Limerick, where he had about twelve thousand soldiers. The French king, who was still resolved to support James, embarked the

thousa

0 te

in pl

lif

ee

rea

orl

rt

b

ole

d f

Wi

ent

erv

ned

efea

rde

ecau

hin

, it

land

abo

, w

thi

oula

thousand troops for Limerick: nor did he stop here; for he sent over a large supply of all necessaies for the inhabitants as well as foldiers. Forty ransport-ships sailed for Ireland, under the convoy of twelve men of war : containing all kind of fuctours, in men, arms, and all other requisites; engineers, gunners, bombardiers, and two hundred masons; saddles, bridles, and housings, for above twenty thousand horse; a great number of cannon, with their carriages; fusees, pistols, and swords, fifficient to arm twenty-fix thousand men; provifons, cloaths, and twenty-fix thousand pair of shoes. Limerick was foon afterwards besieged; and, as the place was so strongly reinforced, the inhabitants expected the king would appear in their defence. lames, however, not coming, the town furrenderd. The French fleet returned to France, bringing over with them no less than twenty thousand Irish, foldiers as well as other refugees.

'Tis not a little astonishing, that, notwithstanding Althese rebuffs, Lewis was not yet discouraged; for though he at that time maintained a heavy war against almost all Europe, yet he resolved to make mother grand effort in favour of James, by making adescent on England with twenty thousand men. They were accordingly affembled betwixt Cherburg and La Hogue; and three hundred transort-ships were got ready at Brest. Tourville, with bity-four men of war, waited for them on the naft of Normandy; and d'Etrées was on his way from Toulon with another squadron of thirty sail. hs there are misfortunes which arise from bad combut, so there are likewise others which can be imputed only to ill-fortune. The wind, which was afirst favourable to d'Etrée's squadron, chopped bout; which prevented his joining Tourville, who has attacked by the united fleets of England and Holland, of near an hundred fail. Superiority of number obtained the victory; and the French were obliged to sheer off, after an obstinate fight of ter hours. Russel, the English admiral, pursued them two days : fourteen of their largest ships, two o which mounted an hundred and four guns, were stranded on the coast; and the captains, knowing they must be destroyed by the enemy, with their own hands fired them. King James, who was himself a spectator of this calamity from the shore abandoned himself to despair.

This was the first check which the maritime power Seignelai, who, following the of Lewis received. steps of his father Colbert, had greatly improve the marine of France, died about the end of the year 1600. Pontchartain, lieutenant of Britany, succeed ed him as secretary of naval affairs: he likewish kept up the maritime power with equal vigilance and the whole French ministry promoted it wit the same spirit; so that the very year after the de feat at La Hogue, the French navy was as formi Tourville was foon at the head of dable as ever. fixty ships of the line, and d'Etrées had thirty un der his command, exclusive of those which lay i the harbours: nay, about four years after, the kin equipped a fquadron more numerous than any o the former, to convoy James to England, with twenty thousand French. But this fleet only shew ed itself; the measures, pursued by James's friends being as ill conducted at London, as they had bee well concerted in France by his friend and protector.

The dethorned prince's party, being defeated i in their projects, had now at last recourse to form ing plots against his rival's life. Almost all those who were concerned in these conspiracies, suffere death : and, tho' they had even succeeded, 'tis no likely that James would ever have recovered hi kingdom. He spent the remainder of his days

St

L

fa

cr

be ye

Je

to

ed

fh

Ja

m

fir

an

ei

th

Ja

E

fir

in

hi

hi

th

gu de

In

E

the

an the

the

OU

gr

of

eff

the

of

er

ter

en

0

er

ing

nei

Wa

ore

We

th

ove

yea

eed

wil

nce

with

e de

rmi

ad o

y un

ay i

kin

ny o

wit

shew

iends d beet

pro

ted i

form

thole

uffere

'tis no red hi

days a

St. Germains, where he lived upon the bounty of Lewis, and a yearly pension of seventy-two thoufand livres, which he was fo mean as to receive fecretly from his daughter Mary, by whom he had been dethroned. He died at St. Germains, in the year 1700; and it was pretended by some Irish Jesuits, that there were miracles wrought at his tomb: there was even a report, that Rome intended to canonize this prince after his death, whom he had intirely forfaken during his life.

Few princes had been more unfortunate than lames; nor have we any instance in history of a family fo unhappy for such a number of years. The first of his ancestors, who reigned over Scotland. and was likewise named James, after having been eighteen years a prisoner in England, was, together with his queen, murdered by his own subjects. James II. his fon, was killed in a battle with the English, at the age of nineteen. James III. being first imprisoned by his people, was afterwards killed in the field by the rebels. James IV. likewise loft his life in an unfortunate battle. Mary Stuart, his grand-daughter, having been driven from her throne, took refuge in England; where, after languishing in prison eighteen years, she was condemned to death by English judges, and accordingly beheaded. Charles I. her grandson, king of England, as well as Scotland, being delivered up by the Scots, was sentenced to death by the English, and fuffered publicly on a scaffold. James his son, the seventh of the name, and second of England, the subject of this part of our history, was driven out of his three kingdoms; and, as a further aggravation of his misfortunes, even the legitimacy of his fon was disputed. This son likewise made efforts to regain the throne of his ancestors; bu they proved fruitless, and were only the occasions of many of his friends suffering death by the hands St.

Ch

dres

Tu

Afi

mo

tho

him

the

ven

1 wer

not Fra

land the hun

refe

his

was the

mar

esta

wor

pub

" I

com

fath

" D

" 0

Mtm

of public executioners. We have also lately seen Charles-Edward in vain exerting the virtues of his royal ancestors, and the courage of his mother's father king John Sobiesky: this youth has performed great exploits, and undergone the most incredible hardships: but all to no purpose. If any thing can justify the opinion of those who believe in a fatality, according to which the affairs of mankind are governed, 'tis this continued series of misfortunes, which has persecuted the Stuart family for above three hundred years.

CHAPTER XV.

What passed on the continent, whilst William took possession of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to the year 1697.

So far I have been unwilling to break the thread of the affairs in England; I now return to those on the continent.

The king had certainly increased his navalstrength to fuch a degree, as no nation ever exceeded: he had to encounter with the emperor, the Empire, Spain, the two maritime powers of England and Holland, become now more formidable by being under one head, besides Savoy, and almost all Italy. One only of these enemies, such as England or Spain, would have been sufficient formerly to crush France; and now, all together, could hardly struggle with her. Lewis had generally five armies in the course of this war; sometimes fix, and never less than four. Those in Germany and Flanders often amounted to an hundred thoufand foldiers, besides garisons kept up in the frontier towns. The French monarch had at one time, including his land and naval forces, four hundred dred and fifty thousand men in pay. Neither the Turkish empire, so powerful in Europe, Asia, and Africa, nor the Roman, still greater, had ever more, nor fo many wars at once to support. Even those who blamed Lewis XIV. for drawing upon himself so many enemies, could not help admiring the measures he took to oppose, or rather to prevent, all hostile attacks.

n-

ny

Ve

n-

is-

for

1

id,

ead

to

gth

he

ire,

and

eing

all

ng-

erly ould

rally

mes

nany

hou-

the t one hundred

His enemies were not yet intirely declared, nor were they all united. The prince of Orange had not yet failed out of the Texel for England; and France had already armies on the frontiers of Holland, and on the Rhine. Lewis had fent his for the Dauphin into Germany, with an army of an hundred thousand men. This young prince greatly relembled the queen his mother, in the sweetness of his disposition, and modesty of his behaviour. He was then twenty-feven years of age; and this was the first time of his being invested with the command; which was not intrusted to him, till he had established such a character as shewed him highly worthy of this honour. The king faid to him in public, at his departure 2; " My fon, in fending "you to command my armies, I give you an op-"portunity to display your merit : go and shew it "to all Europe; fo that when I shall descend into "my grave, I may appear to be still living in " you."

The prince had a commission made out for his command, in the same manner as if he had been my other general whom the king had chosen. father directed to him thus: " To our fon the "Dauphin, our lieutenant-general, and commander

" of our armies in Germany."

Every thing was fettled and disposed with the atmost carefulness, for the campaign in Germany, ² September 22. 1688.

Ch

obe

thol

rich

the

ima

pene

was

Won

utmo

field

coun

the o

dem

wreto

relide

Were

were

imagi

the af

that b

XIV.

troye

nate,

terrible

with h

tiele o

of fuc

marqui

ad C

teart:

measure

Lewis,

dis tra

are ex

is own

that the fon of Lewis, who honoured it with his name and presence, might not meet with any disgrace. The marshal de Duras, in reality, com. manded the army. Boufleurs headed a body of troops on this side the Rhine; and marshal d'Humieres was posted with another towards Cologne to observe the motions of the enemy. Heidelberg and Mentz were taken : the siege of Philipsbourg was likewise begun; an undertaking always though first necessary, when France carried on a war in Wauban conducted the siege; and al Germany. the scenes of action, which fell not to him, devolved upon Catinat, the lieutenant-general; a man who had courage and abilities equal to any enterprize His royal highness the Dauphin arrived six day after the trenches were opened: he imitated the conduct of his father, exposing himself to danger, when necessary, with great intrepidity, tho' with out rashness; affable to every body, and liberal to the foldiers. The king felt a fincere joy in having a fon, who imitated without eclipfing him, and who without raising the jealousy of his father, made him felf univerfally beloved.

Philipsbourg was taken in nineteen days, Manheim in three, and Frankendal in two; Spires Treves, Worms, and Oppenheim, furrendered a foon as the French appeared before their gates.

The king had resolved to make a perfect deser of the Palatinate, as soon as the towns should be taken: his design in this was rather to cut off also substitute from his enemies, than to revenge himself of the elector Palatine, who had indeed don nothing but his duty, in entering into a league with the rest of Germany against France. There came an order from Lewis, signed Louvois, to reduce also ashes. The French generals, being obliged to

Nov. 2. 1688. Nov. 15. 1688.

is

iſ.

n. 0

U-

ie,

rg

110 gh in al

red

ho

ze ay

th

er

th

to

in

ho

im

an

res

da

.

fer

1 6

Fal

im

on

wit

bey,

obey, accordingly gave notice to the citizens of those towns, but lately repaired, and then so flouribing, to the inhabitants of the villages, and to the owners of above fifty castles, that they must immediately quit their habitations, though it happened then to be the dead of winter; for that all was to be destroyed by fire and sword d. Men, women, and children, accordingly moved off in the umost trepidation: some wandered about in the felds, and others took refuge in the neighbouring countries, whilst the soldiery, who generally exceed the orders of feverity, and come short of those of demency, burnt and facked the country of this wretched people. They begun with Manheim, the relidence of the electors: their houses and palaces were rased to the ground; nay, the very graves were ransacked by the rapacious soldiery; who, inagining they should find treasures there, disturbed the ashes of the dead. This was the second time hat beautiful country was laid waste under Lewis MV. but the flames, with which Turenne had defreyed two towns and twenty villages of the Palatiute, were but sparks in comparison of this last trible destruction, which all Europe looked upon with horror. The officers themselves, who executed bese orders, were ashamed at being the instruments fluch severity. They highly reflected on the tarquis de Louvois, who, from a long ministry, ad contracted an inhumanity and hardness of tert: he it was, indeed, who advised these cruel teasures; and how noble would it have been in lewis, had he rejected them! Had the king beheld is tragical scene, with his own hands he would ame are extinguished the flames: but when he figned e a te destruction of a whole country, he was seated in d to k own palace, furrounded with pleasures; and it [·] Feb. 1689.

Ch.

Men

notw

nor v

he m

five

rend

oblig

of th

brav

unju

that

to j

with

few

peit

who

at h

to t

who

dra

ple

rit,

is a

def

Va

tho

tra

arn

to 100

but

the

the poi

Voi

appeared there only a lawful act of power, and the right of war. Had he viewed the affair itself, it must have filled him with the utmost horror. Nations who had hitherto only blamed, whilst they admired his ambition, now exclaimed aloud against his barbarity, and highly condemned his policy; for is in enemies could have penetrated into his dominions after his own example, they would have reduced his towns to ashes.

There was one quarter, however, from which France had reason to fear: Lewis, by covering his frontiers with an hundred thousand soldiers, has taught Germany to make the like efforts. country, being more populous than France, was able to furnish very large armies: these, indeed, are raised, assembled, and paid, with more difficulty; i requires likewise more time before they are able to make a figure in the field; but their discipline, and patience of fatigue, renders them, towards the end of the campaign, as formidable as the French are at the beginning. Charles V. duke of Lorrain, then commanded them: this prince, who had been stripped of his dominions by Lewis XIV. and nevel able to regain them, had preferved the empire to the emperor Leopold, and gained feveral victories over the Turks and Hungarians. He came now, together with the elector of Brandenbourg, to oppose the French power: he retook Bonn and Mentz, two inconsiderable, tho' regularly fortified, places Bonn held out three months and fourteen days, and then furrendered •; when the chief commander, baron d'Asfield, was mortally wounded, in a general affault.

The marquis d'Uxelles, afterwards a marshal of France, a man of the utmost sagacity and foresight, made such excellent dispositions for the desence of October 12. 1689.

Mentz,

15

the

nul

ons

irec

bar-

fhi

ons

ced

hick

hi.

had

Thi

Was

are

;

e to

and

end

ar

ain

been

eve

e to

ries

WOI

op-

entz

aces

and

der

ge.

al of

ight,

e of

entz,

Mentz, that his garifon was but flightly fatigued, notwithstanding the long duty they had performed: nor was his activity confined within the town; for he made one-and-twenty fallies, and killed above five thousand of the enemy: in fine, he at last furrendered at the end of seven weeks; and this he was obliged to do for want of powder. The defence of this town merits a place in history, from the bravery with which it held out, and because of the unjust censure of the public on this occasion. Paris, that vast city, so full of idle persons, who pretend to judge of every transaction, that city, which, with fo many tongues, and fo many cars, has fo few eyes, condemned d'Uxelles as a man who had neither courage nor judgment. This gentleman, who was justly praised by all the most able officers, athis return from the campaign, happening to go to the theatre, was hooted and hissed by the house, who called aloud, Mentz! He was obliged to withdraw; despising, as all sensible persons must, a people who she wed themselves such bad judges of meit, and of whom, nevertheless, every one almost is ambitious of receiving the applauses.

About this time f, the marshal d'Humieres was deseated by prince Waldeck in the Netherlands, at Valencour on the Sambre: but this overthrow, though it hurt the marshal's reputation, yet it detacted but little from the glory of the French arms. Louvois, his friend and patron, was obliged to take from him the command. Neither the king nor Louvois had any affection for Luxembourg; but, as both had the honour of France at heart, they invested him with the command, contrary to their natural inclination. He was accordingly appointed general in the Low Countries; for Louvois either at first made a proper choice, or, when mistaken, [!] June 1689.

Ch.

dices

In re

he W

with

Arich

6 W

hort

out a

Ca

pofec

equa

tunes

ami

perfe

carri

fuch

25 W

der ;

guilt

It is

0 00

gene plete

of S

Who

one

cont

in a feat e

nen Savo

er t abje for co

place

reck

mistaken, rectified his error by a speedy alteration. Catinat had the command in Italy. The marshal de Lorges made a good defence in Germany; and the duke de Noailles had some success in Catalonia; but the army in Flanders, commanded by Luxembourg, and that in Italy under Catinat, had a continued flow of success. These two generals were, at that time, the most renowned in Europe.

The marshal duke de Luxembourg had, in his character, some resemblance of the great Condé under whom he had learned the art of war: he was of a forward enterprising spirit, and quick in execution; of a genius eager after knowledge, but unbounded and irregular; of an amorous disposition which continually engaged him in intrigues: and tho' of a deformed person, as well as disageeable countenance, yet he often met with a return of love from the fair sex: in short, his qualities were rather those of an hero than a sage.

Catinat was a person of such application and activity, that he was equal to the most arduous enter prizes, yet never piquedhimself on any of his actions He would have made a good minister, or chancellor, as well as an excellent general. He had been at first a counsellor, but had quitted this profession twentythree years ago, from a difgust he conceived at the loss of a cause, which had been unjustly determined. He then went into the army, and served at first in the French guards. In the year 1667, at the attack of the counterscarp of Lisle, in sight of the king, he performed an exploit, which required both courage and conduct. His majesty remarked him particularly; and his fortune commenced from that time; for he was raised by degrees, without the least solicitation. He was a perfect philosopher in the midst of grandeur and war, the two most dangerous rocks to moderation; and free from all prejudices. al

hd

21

ef

d

ìa.

efe

'n

hi

dé

was

cu

un-

on

ind able

n o

vere

ac

nter-

ons llor.

firft

enty-

t the ned.

ft in

cou-

that

leaft

n the ngeroreju-

dices.

dices, without affecting too much to despise them. in regard to gallantry, and other courtly intrigues, he was utterly ignorant; but he cultivated friendship with great fincerity, and always behaved with the hiftest honour. As he was intirely free from pride, h was he likewise from all narrow selfishness: in hort, he shewed himself a real philosopher throughout all his life.

Catinat commanded then in Italy. He was opwled by Victor Amedeus, duke of Savoy; a prince qually famous for his wisdom, policy, and misformes: he was a courageous general, headed his own zmies, exposed himself as a common soldier, and was refectly acquainted with that fort of war generally arried on in confined and mountainous countries. fich as his was: he was a person of great activity s well as vigilance, and a remarkable lover of orer; but, with all his qualifications, he was often gilty of misconduct as a prince, and as a general. his faid, he was guilty of an error in the dispositimof his army against that of Catinat. The French general took advantage of this, and gained a comlete victory, in fight of Saluces, near the abbey of Stafarola, from whence the battle was named. When there happens to be a great number sain on me side, and but a few on the other, this is an inunteltable proof, that the vanquished army fought ha finuation wherein they must unavoidably be detated. The French army lost only three hundred ten, tho' that of the allies, under the duke of ttack king, woy, had four thousand killed on the spot. Aftrihis battle, all Savoy, except Monmelian, was bjected. Catinat then marched into Piedmont; fixed the enemy's trenches near Susa; took that parlace, Villafranca, Montalban, Nice, which was kokoned impregnable, Veillane, Carmagnole , and

g 1691.

Ch

tho

bou

bad

him

tow

ed,

he d

carr

battl

whice

Fran

qua

L

fron

hods

bre a goon

and the

with

lage c

rent }

onque left L

About

fimou

laving

blige

write confeq

meatur was fal

attacke

Wake:

Darsha

1 Apr

returned again to Monmelian, which he took, after an obstinate siege.

After this great success, the French minister thought proper to diminish the army under his command, whilst the duke of Savoy augmented his Catinat, now weaker than his vanquished enemy was obliged, for a considerable time, to act only of the defensive; but having at last received a reinforcement, he descended from the Alps to Marsfeilles, and there gained a second pitched battle which was the more glorious, as prince Eugene of Savoy was one of the enemy's commanders.

On that side of France towards the Low Countries, marshal Luxembourg gained the battle of Fleurus. This victory, as all the officers acknowleged, was chiefly owing to the superior genius of the French commander over the prince of Walded then general of the allied army. In this action eight thousand of the enemy were made prisoner and six thousand killed; two hundred of their standards, with all their artillery and baggage, we likewise taken, and their whole army, in short completely routed, and put to flight i.

King William, having vanquished his father in-law, was returned to the continent: he had genius so fruitful in resources, that he often dre more advantage from a defeat, than the Frendid from their victories: and though he was oblig to have recourse to all manner of intrigues and negotiations, to raise money and forces to carry on war against an absolute prince; yet, soon after the defeat of Fleurus, he appeared at the head of army as strong as the French, to oppose Luxenbourg k.

¹ October 4. 1691. 1 June 30. 1690. 1 September 19. 1690.

The two armies confifted each of about eighty housand men. Mons was invested by Luxembourg 1, before king William believed the French had moved out of their winter-quarters. Lewis simfelf was present at the siege; and entered the own on the ninth day after the trenches were opened, in fight of the allied army. Immediately after, be departed for Versailles, leaving Luxembourg to arry on that campaign, which was finished by the battle of Leuses m; a most extraordinary action, in which eighteen squadrons of the houshold troops of france, and the gendarmery, defeated feventy-five huadrons of the enemy.

un

VC

IS

ecl

tio

ner

fta

we

ho

the

had

dre

ren

blig

nd no

y on ter th

of

Lewis again appeared at the siege of Namur, the frongest and most important place in the Netherhads, by its fituation at the confluence of the Samhe and Maese, and the strength of its citadel built upon the rocks. He took this city in about a week, and the forts in twenty-two days n; whilft the duke of Luxembourg was posted near the Mehaigne with twenty four thousand men, to hinder the pasage of William, who had eighty thousand, and pretent his attempting to raise the siege. After this onquest, the king again returned to Versailles, and If Luxembourg to oppose the confederate army. About this time happened the battle of Steenkirk, amous for stratagem and valour. The enemy, laving discovered a French spy in their army, bliged him, before they put him to death, to wite false advice to marshal Luxembourg; in onsequence of which, the French general took such measures as promised success; but as the intelligence uxemras false, they had a contrary effect: his army was macked by day-break, before the troops were a-Take: a whole brigade was put to flight before the * Se parshal scarce knew of the enemy's arrival; and

April 9. 1691. m September 1621. n June 1692. all

co

oke

rioc

allec

mie

lory

eir

be at t

in.

Th

preti

nd m tke p ren l

hke o

102 om t

i for

e wa

ior.

All

old tr

afted

mess

oops,

mid.

tench

any

eded,

bglish

Dy v

Bouf

ring t

Villian

To be a great general is not sufficient to prevent a deseat, without disciplined troops capable of rallying, and general officers both able and willing to retrieve the distress; for one superior officer alone, who had been willing to take advantage of this consussion, in order to bring about his general's deseat, might have done it easily without being discovered.

Luxembourg was at this . time indisposed; an unfortunate circumstance at a juncture which required new strength and vigour. The sense of the present danger, however, roused his strength. To prevent a defeat, he must perform wonders; and he did so: he changed his ground, in order to give hi army another and more convenient situation for a engagement; he recovered the right brigade, which was in the utmost disorder; he thrice rallied his forces, and thrice charged the enemy at the head of the houshold troops; and all this in less than two He had then in his army the duke de Chartres, afterwards regent of the kingdom, grandson of France, not above fifteen years of age it was not to be expected, that such a youth could be of service in any decisive stroke; the sight, how ever, of a grandson of France, at such an age charging at the head of the houshold troops wounded in battle, and, notwithstanding that, ye continuing in the combat, greatly animated the foldiery.

Therewere likewise a grandson and grand-nepher of the great Condé, who both served as lieutenant generals: one was Lewis duke de Bourbon, the other Armand prince of Conti, rivals to each other [·] August 3. 1692.

an

e de n, 4 age

ould

OW-

age. ops,

, ye

fol-

, the

other

10

courage, spirit, ambition, and reputation : the the was of a temper more reserved than the other, and had, perhaps, more solid qualities, whilst the e. ince had more shining ones: they had been both of alled upon by the public voice to the command of mies, and both had a passionate desire for such a bry: but neither had yet arrived at the height of the wishes; for Lewis, who knew their ambition be as great as their merit, always remembred in the prince of Condé had declared war against im.

The prince of Conti was the first who contributed the performed his duty with the same spirit, not the performed his duty with the same spirit, not the net requiring emulation to spur him on. The this die de Vendome, grandson of Henry IV. was a lie lieutenant-general in this army: he had served hich in the age of twelve years; and, though then in his infortieth, yet he had never commanded in chief; do h was accompanied by his brother the grand-two nor.

All these princes were obliged to head the hous-all troops, in order to dislodge a body of English, and in an advantageous place; and on this the mes of the battle depended. The houshold mps, and the English, were then the best in the old. A most dreadful slaughter ensued: the tench, however, animated by the presence of so my princes and nobles, by whom they were aded, at last gained the advantage; and the which being defeated, the rest of the confederate nant Bouflers, afterwards a marshal of France, who spened to be some miles from the field of battle ring the action, came up, at this juncture, with s dragoons, and completed the victory. King Illiam, having loft feven thousand men, recired Vol. I. מונו wi has much order as he had attacked; and, the defeated, yet always to be feared, he still kept to field. This victory, won by the valour of the young princes, and the very flower of the Fren nobility, produced such an effect at court, at Par and in the provinces, as no other had ever do before.

The duke de Bourbon, the prince of Conti, duke de Vendome, with his brother and all th friends, at their return, found the roads lined w the populace, who received them with loud acc mations, and a joy that proceeded almost to m ness: all the women pressed forward, with the most eagerness, to see and be seen by these hero It was at that time the fashion amongst the men wear laced cravats, which they generally took fo pains and time to put on properly: the princes, h ing dreffed themselves in a hurry for the battle, I thrown them carelesly about their necks: the lad upon this, wore handkerchiefs in that tafte, wh they called steenkirks; all the new trinkets w made à la steenkerque; and any young fellow, v had been at the late battle, was received eve where with the highest favour. The people crou from all parts about the princes, who were unit fally beloved; and the more, because their favour court was far from being equal to their glory.

The same general, with the same princes, the same troops, which had been surprised, and came off victorious, at Steenkink, the sollow campaign, attacked king William, after a march one-and-twenty miles, and defeated him at N winde, a village near the Layette, not far surprinces. William had just time to draw up army in order of battle. Luxembourg, and princes, twice carried the village sword in habout the enemy as often retook it, as soon

Luxembou

Lux

OW

attl

xtre

100 hou

ight

han !

Al

dvar

teen

lly v

etrea

noth

tho I

ras h ave c ourg

othin

ad for

lande

ling

forts,

to the

The

erable

ifone

ated i

is fuc

auphi

tich t

is was

ainst 1

Marf

dthe

July

tt

the en

Par

do

i,

th W

m

rou

univ

es,

and

llow

nare

at N

up. and

foon

embou

the Luxembourg turned to another quarter: the French, owever, at last gained it a third time, and the attled ended in their favour P. The fight was attemely obstinate, and few were ever more body: there were killed on the spot, in all, twenty bouland men; twelve thouland of the allies, and aid, they ought rather to have fung De profundis

All these victories procured great glory, but little drantage. The allies, tho' defeated at Fleurus, henkirk, and Nerwinde, had not yet been effectutreats; and, about fifteen days after one battle, nother generally followed, in order to determine to fho should keep the field. The cathedral of Paris as hung round with the enemy's colours; which we occasion to the prince of Conti to call Luxemble, led our the upholsterer of Notre-Dame. There was who thing now talked of but victories. Lewis XIV. Is we adformerly conquered the half of Holland and way, and all Franche-Comté without fighting ever single battle: but now, after so many grand forms. ionts, and bloody victories, he could not penetrate to the United provinces, nor lay siege to Brussels. The marshal de Lorges had also gained a consi-ry. The marshal de Lorges had also gained a consi-ry. The marshal de Lorges had also gained a consi-ry. The marshal de Lorges had also gained a consifoner the old duke de Wirtemberg, and penetted into the heart of his country; but, after all is success, he had been forced to retire. aphin had twice taken and facked Heidelberg, sich the enemy as often retook; so that his high-diswas at last obliged to act only on the defensive pinst the Imperialists.

Marshal de Catinat, after the victory at Stafarda, in half the conquest of all Savoy, could not even save

July 29. 1693. 9 Sept. 1. & 2. 1692.

Dauphiné

Malo

Engl

was 1

nage brity

o its

thes

wen

he h

hen,

with.

again

purpo

lifee

Was

that t

truth

So

thev

XIV

profi

again

an ar

W

ame

tin

com

foun.

ban:

real :

the p

the to Nam

and e bund

10 a

Dauphiré from an irruption of the duke of Savoy neither was he able, after his victory at Marseille to preserve the important town of Casal.

In Spain, the marshal de Noailles also gained battle near the banks of the river Ter . He to Girona, and some other inconsiderable places: & he had only a weak army, and was obliged, after victory, to retire from before Barcelona. T French, victorious on all sides, and weakened wi fuccess, found the allies to be an hydra, alwa fpringing up afresh. It began now to be somewh difficult to muster up recruits in France, and mo fo to raise money. The severity of the season having destroyed the fruits of the earth, brought a famine also at this time; so that, in the midst their Te Deums and rejoicings, the French werepe rishing with want and misery. Their wonted spin and notion of superiority, the very soul of the Fren troops, began likewise to fink apace. Lewis h ceased to command them; Louvois was dead and they were highly diffatisfied with his fon Be belieux: finally, the death of marshal Luxen bourg , under whom the foldiers thought themselve invincible, seemed to put an end to the rapid cour of France's victories.

The art of bombarding maritime towns will ships, was now used against its inventors: that in fernal machine, with which the English attempts to destroy St. Malo, and which blew up too so to do execution, did not owe its original to the in genuity of France: these fire-ships had been used in Europe a considerable time before; but it the art of throwing bombs with as much certain from a moving vessel as from the solid ground which the French claim as their invention; and was by this art that Dieppe, Havre-de-grace, St. May 27. 1694. 1694.

lalo, Dunkirk, and Calais, were bombarded by the woy soglish fleets x. Dieppe, being the most accessible, sille was the only one which suffered considerable danage. This town, now so agreeable by the regunded wity of its buildings, which owes its present beauty too wits former destruction, was intirely reduced to the shes. In Havre-de-grace there were only about wenty houses destroyed; but the fortifications of the harbour were utterly demolished. In this sense ben, the medal struck in Holland is founded on buth, tho' the French historians have exclaimed gainst its falsity. The exergue is in Latin, to this surpose; The harbour of Havre burnt and demofor thed, &c. This inscription does not say the town ht a was destroyed, which would be was destroyed, which would have been false; but but the harbour was destroyed, which was the real epre truth.

Soon after, we again lost Namur. In France hey had bestowed the highest encomiums on Lewis XIV. for taking this place; nor had they been less possible of their raillery, and indecent resections, gamst William, for not being able to relieve it with narmy of eighty thousand men.

wi lwa

w

df

fpir

s h ead

Bar

ıxem

felre

coun

s with

mpte

100 the b

n uk

it it

rtaint

round

andi

ce, St y 169

Mal

rend

William made himself master of the place, in the ame manner he had seen it taken. He attacked tin fight of an army much stronger than that he commanded, when Lewis besieged Namur. found there many new fortifications, raised by Vautan: the French garison, which defended it, was a teal army; for, during his preparations to invest the place, marshal Bousters had thrown himself into he town with seven regiments of dragoons: thus, Namur was defended with fixteen thousand men, ad every moment expecting to be relieved by an bundred thousand more. Marshal de Boussers was a active and indefatigable general, and a true pa-

^{*} July 1694. and 1695.

Ch.

M

ern c

he

von

ard sbel

ond

mels

ho' arri

doit

Lew

T

dered

reng

town equal

the I

with

lation

drain

one :

nca.

or ar

lican

and o

mies

hest

then forms

T

at ar

triot; employing his whole thoughts for the service of his country, which he loved as much as lift itself.

The marquis de Feuquieres, in his Memoirs blames Bouflers for many pieces of misconducti his defence of the town and citadel of Namur nay, he even reflects upon him for his defence of Liste, which redounded so much to his honour The writers of Lewis XIV's reign have all fervile ly copied the marquis for affairs of war, as they hav the abbé de Choisi for private histories. They di not, or, perhaps, had not an opportunity to know that Feuquieres, tho' an excellent officer, who knew the practice and theory of war, was a man of no less chagrin than brightness of genius, the Ari starchus of generals, and sometimes the Zoilus He misrepresents facts, in order to have the pleafure of censuring faults: he reproached every body almost, and, in his turn, was also universally reproached; thence he was faid to be the bravest man in Europe, because he slept every night amids a hundred thousand enemies. His merit not having been distinguished with a marshal's staff, he there fore employed, against all the officers of state, his whole wit and talents; which might have been d great fervice to the public, had he been as happy his temper as in his great abilities.

He reproaches marshal de Villeroi with more and greater misconduct than Boussers. Villeroi, at the head of eighty thousand men, was to have succoured Namur: but, had even the two marshals done all in their power, the situation of the ground was such, that Namur could not have been relieved, and must have surrendered sooner or later: and the army posted on the banks of the Mehaigne, in the same manner as that which had before obstructed William, now necessarily proved the like hindrance to marshal de Villeroi's army.

Marshel

15 vic

lif

oirs ct i ur e o our vile hav di di

low

ne f no

ilus

plea-

re

If an

aving

here

e, his

en of

at the rfhals

round

eved,

in the

rance

arthe

Marshal de Boussers, the count de Guiscard, gomor of Namur, the count de Laumont de Chaelet, commander of the infantry, together with all the officers and soldiers, defended the town with monderful obstinacy and valour; but all did not read its being taken above two days. When a town shesieged by a superior army, the works properly conducted, and the season favourable, one may wess pretty nearly in what time it will be taken, to the defence be ever so vigorous. King William wried the city and citadel of Namur; but this exbit cost him a little more time than it had done lewis XIV.

The king, at the time when he loft Namur, or-

Ati dered Bruffels to be bombarded y: a fruitless retenge which he took on the king of Spain, for those owns lately bombarded by the English.

body qually ruinous and fatal to both parties.

Tis now two centuries since the restless spirit of man the Europeans, not contented to confine their fury within their own continent, have carried the desokions of war to the most distant countries. We now train ourselves of money and men, to go to destroy me another in the remotest parts of Asia and Ameica. The Indians, whom we have obliged, by force py in wartifice, to receive our fettlements, and the Ameicans, of whom we have butchered such numbers, e and and driven from possessions, look upon us as enemies of the human race, who come from the farhelt parts of the world to cut their throats, and fuc. hen to plunge our swords into each other's boloms.

The French had, at this time, no other colony in nd the India but Ponticherry, which Colbert had established an immense expence; but no advantage could ructed reaped from it for several years. The Dutch ea-

⁸ September 1695.

fily took it; and thus ruined the commerce of France in India, when in its infancy.

The English destroyed the French settlement St. Domingo z. A privateer from Brest ravage the English colony at the isle of Gambea in Afric The privateers of St. Malo had likewise carrieds and fword into their possessions in New-England Their Island of Jamaica had been also harassed b our squadrons, their vessels taken and burnt, a their coasts plundered.

Pointis, the commander of the squadron, wi a considerable number of the king's ships, and for American corfairs, went to surprise the town of Ca thagena , the magazine of all the treasure which Spain brings from Mexico. The damage he d there was computed at twenty millions of livre and his gain at ten millions: but fomewhat is a ways to be abated in these calculations; tho' no thing in those extreme calamities arising from suc glorious expeditions.

The Dutch and English merchantmen were dail made prizes by the French privateers, but especially by Dugué-trouin, a man of a singular genius, who wanted only the command of fleets to gain him the reputation of a Dragut, or a Barberosse. The enem did not take so many of the French merchant-ships for they had fewer to take; their commerce being greatly declined by the war, and the death of Colbert.

The result of these sea and land expeditions wa universal calamity. Those who have more humanity than policy will certainly take notice, that, it this war, Lewis was in arms against the king of the Spain his same his against the king of the his same Spain, his own nephew; against the elector of Barvaria, whose sister had been married to the Dan aff phin; and against his near relation the elector Pala and 1695. May 1697. 1696. 2 1695.

Ch.

ine, vor

n-la

toke

the

gair

nost

ind

var. tec

be lanc

ble

Eng

W2S

only

don

Th

I

(

rance int, whose dominions he laid waste by fire and word. King James was dethroned by his own fonlaw and daughter. We even afterwards faw the tike of Savoy joining in a league against France, there one of his daughters was dauphiness, and gainst Spain, where another was queen. In short, not of the wars amongst Christian princes, are a ed b ind of civil wars.

The most unwarrantable undertaking in all this ar, was the most successful one; for William sucmeded in every thing in England and Ireland; on te continent, the successes were pretty equally balaced. When I call this undertaking unwarrantwhice sile, I do not pretend to examine, whether the logish nation, after having spilt the father's blood, as in the right or in the wrong to profcribe the in, and to defend their religion and liberty; I say mly, if there is any fuch thing as justice upon earth, bely it was repugnant thereto, for the fon-in-law nd daughter of James to drive him from his kingdom.

CHAPTER XVI.

The peace of Ryswick; the state of Futope, and of France in particular; the death and testament of Charles II. king of Spain.

huma RANCE still preserved the superiority over all hat, it her enemies. She had intirely crushed someting of other, as Savoy and the Palatinate; and had comof bar tenced hostilities on the fron iers of others: she was alrong and powerful body, but satigued by a long relatione, and exhausted by her victories. One low, struck properly, would have made her stagger. 1697. Whoever has a number of enemies at once, cannot,

L 5

tine,

ent

rage

fric d fi land

, an

wi

fon

f Ca

he di

livre

is a

' no

n fuc

e dai ecial

im th enem

· fhips

being

ath o

ns was in the end, be safe, but by a peace, or by their de vision; both which Lewis XIV. soon after brough about.

Victor Amedeus, duke of Savoy, of all the lied princes, knew best what measures to take, who he found it conducive to his interest to break h engagements: it was to him then that the court France first applied. The count de Tessé, afterwar marshal of France, a nobleman of an amiable d position, as well as great abilities, and remarkab for his affability, a talent highly requisite in carr ing on negotiations, was accordingly fent to Turi to found matters privately: and marshal Catinat, man equally formed for the affairs of peace or wa brought the matter to a conclusion. There was necessity, indeed, for two such able statesmen determine the duke of Savoy to accept of offers advantageous. They restored him his dominion they gave him money, and proposed a marriage be twixt the young duke of Burgundy, the Dauphin fon, and his daughter. In short, the affair was foon agreed upon: the duke and Catinat conclude the treaty at Notre Dame de Loretto b, whither they went under pretence of a religious pilgrimage but almost every body saw through their delign Innocent XII. the pope at that time, was extreme desirous of entering into this negotiation. His de fign was at once to deliver Italy from the invalida of the French, and the continual taxes exacted the emperor for the payment of his armies; wanted the Imperialists to leave Italy neuter; the duke of Savoy accordingly engaged to procure him this neutrality by the treaty. The emperor at first stood out; for the court of Vienne feldom came to a determination till the last exire10

we.

int

10

Afr

leas

Ni

par

of

the

con

nic

ma

an

Ch

ban

ma

fro

ien

ner

and eff

Th

this XI

Wii

di

tan and

pol

mo

d ug

e a

wh

k h ert

var

e di

kal

arr

uri

nat.

r war

as n

nen I

fers

nion ge be

phin

ir wa

clude

whithe

mage

delign.

remen His de

mity. The duke of Savoy then joined his army whe French; and, in less than a month, this mince became the generalissimo of the emperor as well as of Lewis XIV. His daughter was carried nto France, at eleven years of age, to be married n the duke of Burgundy, but two years older. After the duke of Savoy had gone off from the lague, it happened then, as before in the peace of Nimegen, that each of the allies began to treat feprately. The emperor was the first, and accepted of the neutrality of Italy. The Dutch proposed he castle of Ryswick, near the Hague, to hold the onferences in, for a general peace. The four arnies, which Lewis had then in the field, hastened natters to a conclusion: he had twenty-four thouand men in Flanders, under Villeroi; marshal de Choiseul was at the head of forty thousand, on the banks of the Rhine; and Catinat commanded as many in Piedmont. The duke de Vendome, who, from a volunteer, had gone through all the different stations in the army, was now at last head gearral in Catalonia, where he had gained a victory, and taken Barcelona. These new and successful thorts were efficacious mediators for the peace. The court of Rome offered her mediation; but his was rejected, as before at Nimegen. Charles Il. king of Sweden, was pitched upon as mediator. valions The peace, in short, was at last concluded a; but not cted by with fuch loftiness, nor on fuch advantageous conies; he dions, as had formerly distinguished the grandeur of Lewis XIV.; for, on the contrary, every thing er; and to proame from his side with a remarkable moderation and condescension. This he considered as good he em-Vienna plicy, and as necessary to make him greater and ft extremore powerful than ever.

^a September, October 1697.

Ch

VOS

Was

for

and

poi

por

200

all

60

En

tio

T

ba

fa

W

ag H

it,

th

21

T

W

2

200

0

- 362

t

0

-

The king of Spain, having been worn out by complication of distempers before his fortieth year was now near his end: after his death, the posterit of Charles would be extinct; for there was no more of that branch surviving. Lewis XIV. had a claim on the Spanish crown, as being grandson to Phili III. by Anne of Austria; and the Dauphin was equally intitled, by Maria-Therefia.

The great aim of Lewis, as it really ought to have been, was to prevent the succession of all that val monarchy of his and his fon's grandfather, from falling wholly into the other branch of the Austrian family. He hoped, that the house of Bourbon would be able, at least, to lay hold of some portion thereof; and that, at last, the might perhaps get the whole into her poffession. The soleman renunciations of his mother and wife appeared to Lewis as formal trifles, that ought to be abolified when new circumstances arose. In this scheme for the aggrandizing of France, it was necessary, however, to put on an appearance of moderation to Europe, in order to keep in quiet so many jealous powers. The peace now gave him time to procure new allies, to re-establish his former finances, as well as to create others which seemed needful, and to train up a new foldiery. He thought proper, therefore, to make some concessions, in hopes of gaining thereby more confiderable advantages.

The king restored to the Spaniards all he had taken near the Pyrenees, in the late war; as he did also Luxembourg, Mons, Ath, and Courtrai, in Flanders. He acknowleged William as lawful king of England, hitherto stiled only prince of Orange, and accounted a tyrant and usurper: he promised likewise to give no assistance to his enemies. King James, who was not even mentioned in the treaty, remained at St. Germains, living on the empty title of king, and Lewis's pension. He sent nothing

now

16

by

year

erit

more

clain

hili

Wa

have

t val

from

Orian

rbon

por-

rhape

lema

ed to ifhed

e for

how-

n to

alous

ocure s, as

, and

heregain-

e had

ne did

i, in

ange,

now

now against his rival but manifestoes : his protector was obliged to facrifice him; and he was already forgotten in Europe.

The decrees passed by the parliaments of Brisac and Metz against fo many fovereigns, and the remions made near Alface, those monuments of nower, and dangerous tyranny, were abolished: and all the jurisdictons which had been seized, were allo returned to the lawful proprietors.

Besides these concessions, Lewis restored Fribourg, Brifac, Kheil and Philipsbourg, to the Empire. He also agreed to demolish the fortificaions of Strasbourg on the Rhine, Fort Lewis, Traerbach, and Mont-royal; works on which Vauban had exhausted his art, and the king his treafures. All Europe became aftonished, and France was moved with indignation, that Lewis should agree to such a peace as if he had been conquered, Harlai, Creci, and Callieres, who had figned it, durst not shew themselves at court, nor in the city; every body loaded them with farcasms and reproaches, as if they had taken a step not ordered by the ministry. The court bitterly reflected upon them for having betrayed the honour of France. The courtiers, having more zeal than penetration, were ignorant, that, upon this treaty, fo shameful in appearance, Lewis intended to found his grandeur.

It was by this treaty that France restored Lorrain to the family which had enjoyed it seven hundred years. Duke Charles V. who had been the support of the Empire, and had conquered the Turks, was king dead; his fon Leopold, at the peace of Ryswick, took possession of his fovereignty; tho' stripped, mifed indeed of his just rights; for he was not permitted King to fortify his capital: but they could not deprive him of a more glorious right, that of acting for the good of his subjects: a right which no prince ever used so worthily as Leopold.

It

rage

his

of p

kno

" th

" n

of I

dea

who

an o

hav

Im

1

of

the

wa

rei

cla

by

int

So

pu

31

at of

la

ne

m B

W

m

th

in

n

C

di

It were to be wished, indeed, it could be re membred to latest posterity, that one of the per tiest princes of Europe was he who did most for the benefit of his people. He found Lorrain de folate and abandoned, which he repeopled and en riched: he preserved it always in peace, whilst al Europe was ravaged by war: his conduct was fo prudent, that he was always on good terms with France, and was at the same time beloved in the Empire; happily keeping that just medium, which petty prince is scarce ever able to preserve betwin two formidable powers. He procured his people an abundance, which they had never known before; and the nobility of Lorrain, who had been reduced to extreme misery, were raised to a state of opulence by his acts of generolity. faw a gentleman's house in ruins, he immediately had it rebuilt at his own expence : he paid their debts, and took care to have their daughters properly married. He was profuse in his presents: and his manner of giving was even superior to his bounty; for he shewed, in all his gifts, at once, the magnificence of a prince, and the politeness of a The arts being honoured in his little province, produced a new circulation, which makes the riches of a state. His court was formed after the model of France; and one who had come from thence to Luneville, would almost imagine himself still at Versailles. After the example of Lewis, he encouraged learning: he established an university at Luneville for true literature, without pedantry; and thither the young nobility of Germany went to receive their education. There the true and useful sciences were taught; and the principles of natural philosophy ocularly demonstrated by the most curious machines. He fearched for men of genius and talents, even in the lowest stations, and most obscure retreats; and, when he found such, he always encouraged re raged and brought them to light. In short, during his whole reign, his only employment was the care of procuring to his people tranquillity, riches, mowledge, and pleasure. " I would quit my der "throne to-morrow," faid he, " if I could do " no more good." Thus he enjoyed the pleafure of being universally beloved; and, long after his death, I myself have seen his subjects shed tears, when his name was mentioned. In short, he left n the an example to the greatest princes; and by his behaviour, not a little paved the way for his fon to the Imperial diadem.

About the time when Lewis was fettling the peace of Ryswick, with a view to the succession of Spain. the crown of Poland became vacant. This crown was the only elective one in the world; and foreigners, as well as Polanders, might put in their claim. There were two ways to procure it, either by merit that was conspicuous, and supported with interest, to carry the votes (as was the case of John Socieski the last king), or by treasure sufficient to purchase this kingdom, which is generally put up to akind of auction. The abbé de Polignac, afterwards cardinal, had, at first, address enough to carry the votes in favour of the Prince de Conti, so well known for his gallant behaviour at Steenkirk and Nerwind: he had never, however, commanded in chief, nor been admitted into the king's privy-council: the duke of Bourbon, his relation, was reputed equal to him in warlike affairs ; and the duke de Vendome was a man of greater renown for martial abilities. Nevertheless, his fame eclipsed that of the other two. This was owing to his art of pleasing, and displaying his talents to the best advantage; an art which nobody ever possessed to an higher degree than Conti. Polignac, who had that of persuading, first determined the electors in that prince's favour. By

his

re rencou-

per

t for

de

If all

is fo

with ich a

wixt

eople

be-

been

State

f he

ately

their

pro-

ents:

o his

, the of a

pro-

nakes

after

from

mself

s, he ity at

; and

o reuseful

atura

rious

d ta-

raged

pana

iper

Zanta

ignic

nade

even

amb

eace

oblig

The

rites

pero

with

eithe

feem

the f

of a

T

Nor

men.

the :

Ruff

The

rivec

ius,

ther

cour

Subje

101

died.

impr

eight

the

the o

who

Char

his eloquence and promises, he counterbalanced the treasure which Augustus, elector of Saxony, had lavished with such profusion. Conti was elected by a considerable majority c; and accordingly proclaimed by the primate of the kingdom. Two hours after, Augustus was likewise chosen, by another party, much less in number; but he was a powerful prince, and had troops in readiness on the frontiers of Poland. The prince de Conti was abfent, without money, without troops, and without power: he had nothing but his name, and the cardinal de Polignac. Lewis ought certainly either to have prevented his accepting of the offer of the crown, or to have supplied him with a sufficient force to carry it against his rival. The French ministry was thought to have done too much, in fending the prince of Conti; and too little, in giving him only a small convoy, and a few bills of exchange, with which he came into the road of Dantzick. This method of beginning affairs, and dropping them, is a kind of policy frequently practifed by the French ministry. The prince de Conti was not even admitted into Dantzick; and his bills were protested. The intrigues of the pope, those of the emperor, and the money and troops of Saxony, had already fecured the crown to his rival. He returned with the glory only of having been elected; and France had the mortification to find, that the was unable to make a king of Poland.

The disgrace of the prince of Conti did not disturb the peace of the North amongst the Christians. The South of Europe was restored to quiet by the treaty of Ryswick; so that there was now no other war remaining, but that which the Turks carried on with Germany, Poland, Venice; and Muscovy. The Christians, however, notwithstanding their illthe panagement, and divisions, had, in this war, the had periority. Soon after, happened the battle of lanta , in which prince Eugene routed the grand pro- ignior at the head of his army. This defeat, wo made remarkable by the death of a grand vizier, and twenty thousand Turks, as a simbled the Ottoman insolence, and brought on the the space of Carlowitz; in which the Turks were ab-bliged to submit to the terms of their conquerors. nout The Venetians were to have Morea, the Musco-car- incs Asoph, the Poles Caminieck, and the emer to peror Transilvania. All Christendom was blessed with perfect tranquillity, and war was not talked of ither in Asia or Africa. The world, in general, femed to be in peace during the last two years of he seventeenth century; a remarkable period, but of a short duration.

the ient

nch

, in

giv-

of

of and

rac-

onti

ills

ofe

of

val.

een

nd,

dif-

ns.

the

her

on

VV.

ill-

The public troubles foon began again. The North was disturbed, in the year 1700. by two men, the most extraordinary that ever appeared in the world; the czar Peter Alexiovitz, emperor of Russia, and young Charles XII. king of Sweden. The czar Peter, though born almost a savage, arfived to a pitch of true grandeur: by force of geins, and labour, he became the reformer, or raher founder, of his empire. Charles XII. more ourageous than Peter, and yet less serviceable to his bjects, being formed to command a foldiery, but m a people, was the first hero of his age: he led, however, with the character of a rash and imprudent prince. That war, which continued eghteen years, and brought such desolation on the North, arose from the ambitious designs of he czar, and the kings of Poland and Denmark, who intended to take advantage of the youth of Charles XII. in order to strip him of some part

d 1697.

• 1699.

of his dominions. Charles, when he was on their fixteen years old, conquered these three prince the period became the terror of the North, and was repute an hero at an age when others have not finishe ther, their education. Nine years he was the most for the midable prince in the world, and nine more the bollant. most unfortunate.

The fresh commotions in the South of Europ of the sprung from another cause. A great dispute are best about dividing the spoils of the Spanish monarch will whose death was approaching. The powers, who is the already enjoyed in idea this vast succession, acted until in the fame manner as generally happens during imily the sickness of a rich old man without children ye, his wife, his relations, the priests, and the lawyer milip placed to receive the last commands of the dying person, beset him on all sides to wrest from him word in their favour. Some agree to share the ad f spoils, whilst others prepare to dispute them.

Lewis XIV. and the emperor Leopold, were in the the same degree of consanguinity: both were water grandsons of Philip III. for both had married daughters of Philip IV. His royal highness the fit Dauphin, and Joseph king of the Romans, the emperor's son, had a double claim by the same proximity. The right of birth was in the house of lad, Bourbon; for the king, and his son the Dauphin, his had the eldest daughters for their Mothers: but the who emperor's family afferted for their rights, first and tree especially, the solemn and ratified renuntiations of Lewis XIII. and XIV. to the crown of Spain; ity, then the name of Austria; the blood of Maximilian, from whom Leopold and Charles II. Was were descended; the almost constant union of the two Austrian branches, and the still more constant hatred against the Bourbons; the aversion which the Spaniards had then to the French nation; and,

of

mild

a dan

varia

The

duke

son their last resource, a certain policy they had in ince the power to govern the Spanish councils.

These two rivals were not only assaid of each ther, but had likewise all Europe to sear. The ther powers, but especially those of England and the thouse of the council interest it was to keep a balance, would never suffer the crown of Spain, with that the same head. William had formed a design, even the same head. William had formed a design, even the same head. William had formed a design, even the same head. William had formed a design, even the same head. William had formed a design, even the same head. William had formed a design, even the same head. William had formed a design, even the same head. William had formed a design, even the same head. William had formed a design, even the same head. This young prince, only eight years of the se, was descended from the youngest daughter of ren ge, was descended from the youngest daughter of yen hilip IV. wife to the emperor Leopold: these had dying a daughter married to Maximilian elector of Baim maia; and the youth, whom the English and Dutch the had fixed upon, was the fruit of this marriage.
The French monarch confented to this; he being were water of Guipuscoa, and several towns. The archrriet duke Charles was to have Milan; and the remainder the of it was to be given up to this young prince of Ba-em wia, whom it would be a considerable time befrom they would have any occasion to fear. Engse of and, France, and Holland, projected and made shin, his treaty f. * France expected to gain an addition to the ther territories; and the English and Dutch flatand tred themselves they should thereby effectually as of stablish quiet in one part of Europe. All this poain; ky, however, proved of no fignification. laxis ying king, being told how much his monarchy Was divided before his death, was moved with the f October 11. 1698.

II. the fant

hich

and,

35

highest

^{*} Larrey and Limiers feem to have known nothing of this first partition-treaty.

highest indignation; and, in consequence of it was a every body expected, that he would declare the ensemperor, or the emperor's son, for his successor The as a recompence to Leopold for not being concerned in the partition; and, in short, that he is the concerned by the power. cerned in the partition; and, in most, testament would be intirely dictated by the power space of the Austrian Family, and wholly agreeable to it upon the Austrian Family, and wholly agreeable to it upon the Austrian Family, and wholly agreeable to it upon the Austrian Family, and wholly agreeable to it upon the Austrian Family, and wholly agreeable to it upon the Austrian Family, and wholly agreeable to it upon the Austrian Family, and wholly agreeable to it upon the Austrian Family, and wholly agreeable to it upon the Austrian Family, and wholly agreeable to it upon the Austrian Family, and wholly agreeable to it upon the Austrian Family, and wholly agreeable to it upon the Austrian Family, and wholly agreeable to it upon the Austrian Family, and wholly agreeable to it upon the Austrian Family, and wholly agreeable to it upon the Austrian Family, and wholly agreeable to it upon the Austrian Family, and wholly agreeable to it upon the Austrian Family, and wholly agree to the Austrian Family, and wholly agree to the Austrian Family and the Austrian Family and the Austrian Family, and wholly agree to the Austrian Family and the Austrian Family agree to the Austrian Family and the Austrian Family agree to the Austria declared the same young prince of Bavaria, who and we have mentioned, heir to all his dominions die The Spanish nation, who feared nothing so mud Char as the dismembering their monarchy, highly applied this disposition; and they hoped, a gentle neral peace would be the effect of it. The fifth hopes, however, were as vain as the partitiontreaty; for the prince of Bavaria, the king elect, as died at Broffels 8.

The house of Austria was unjustly accused, as being the cause of this sudden death; and this only upon the bare probability, that a crime is most like in ly to be committed by those to whom it seems most be advantageous. The intrigues and cabals were renewed in the courts of Madrid, Vienna, Verfaille, London, Rome, and the Hague.

Lewis XIV. king William, and the states general, made another imaginary division of the Spanil monarchy. They affigned to the archduke Charles, younger fon of the emperor, what they had before given to the deceased youth b.

They allo ted Milan to the duke of Lorrain; and his duchy, which had been fo often taken, and as often restored, by the French, was to be for ever annexed to the crown of France. This treaty, which put in motion the political artillery of all the princes, either to oppose or defend it, proved to as little purpose as the former. Europe

file

gar

T

-53

gained

of it ras again disappointed in her expectation, as hap-thems almost always.

The emperor would not sign this treaty of par-cort in ; because he was in great hopes of having the the whole succession. The French monarch had own igned it, and waited the event in the utmost to it supense.

In the king of Spain, being sensible of his decline-whom in state, though in the flower of his age, was intions and to settle his whole monarchy on the archduke muc Charles, nephew to his Queen, and fon to the em-The filem, that he became afraid of naming the eldest ition his successor: such a step, he saw plainly, would elect, sam the rest of Europe, and all the other powers would immediately have recourse to arms, when they saw Spain, with the Indies, the Empire, Hungry, Bohemia, and Lombardy, in the same hands. He therefore requested the emperor Leopold to send his second son, Charles, to Madrid, with wiend his fecond fon, Charles, to Madid, with failles, infered by France, England, Holland, nor Italy; for all were follicitous to bring about the partition.

The emperor would not venture his fon alone to be mercy of the Spanish council; and he knew harles, it could not march ten thousand men to that before lingdom. His intention was only to fend a suffithat body of troops into Italy, to secure himself in orrain; his part of the Spanish-Austrian monarchy. taken, appened, in the important affairs of these two grand to be plinces, as we daily see amongst private persons This bout their little concerns; they disputed, and then rtillery gew out of temper: the German haughtiness end it, Taled the Castilian pride. The countess de Per-Europe itz, who intirely governed the queen of the dying monarch, contributed likewise to alienate the afkitions of many, whom she ought rather to have WES

Mi

itio

feki defin

W

mea WTO

t

u t

a 6

Joly

àn maj

aca I

but 2723 baff

reca

whi

ien c

nih

one

mar

Aile

10]]

Wid

001

E

had

pat

tere fear

ord

gained over to the interest of Madrid; and t council of Vienna rendered things still more in concileable by their haughty procedure.

The young archduke, afterwards the emper Charles VI. generally called the Spaniards by for polyreproachful names. But he learned from then reproachful names. But he learned from then how cautious a prince ought to be in his expression The bishop of Lerida, embassador from Madrid Vienna, being disgusted at the Germans, repr fented what Charles had faid, in the worst light, his dispatches to Madrid; and he himself wro against the house of Austria, in terms more reproact ful than any which the archduke had thrown out gainst the Spaniards: " The minds of the minds " sters of Leopold," said he, " are like the goal horns in my country, little, stubborn, and crook " ed." This letter became public: The bishop Lerida was recalled; and, at his return to Madrid he not a little heightened the antipathy of the Spaniards against the Germans.

Many other little trifling incidents, which are generally connected with affairs of importance, contributed likewise to bring about that great change which happened in Europe, and prepared the way for that revolution, by which the house of Austri for ever lost Spain and the Indies. Cardinal Portocarero, and most of the Spanish grandees, having formed themselves into a party, to prevent the dimembering of their monarchy, perfuaded Charles II. to prefer a young grandson of Lewis XIV. to prince so remote from them, and so incapable to defend them. This, they faid, would be no violation of the solemn renunciations, of the mother and queen of Lewis XIV. to the crown of Spain; since these had been made on purpose to prevent the elder fons from coming into possession of the two kingdoms; and, for that reason, they had chosen

hen

fior

drid

repr

ht,

WIO

oac

out .

min

goa

rook

10p d

adrid

Spare ge-

COU-

hang

e wa

Austri

Porto-

naving

ne di

les II.

to !

ble to viola-

er and

Spain:

revent

d to holen a younger son. It would be likewise doing in fice to the right of blood, at the same time that would preserve the Spanish monarchy from a paropen ition. The scrupulous king consulted divines for pon this point; who were of the same opinion with his council. He then with his council. He then, notwithstanding his kiness, wrote with his own hand to the pope, kliring his opinion in the affair. The pope, who in plainly, that the liberty of Italy depended geatly on the house of Austria's being weakened, mote to Charles, " that the laws of Spain, and the welfare of all Christendom, required him to give the preference to the family of Bour-"bon." This letter was dated the 16th of bly 1700. His holiness, we see, of a case of inscience made a state-affair; whilst his catholic majesty converted an important affair of state into scale of conscience.

Lewis XIV. was informed of these proceedings; but his council had not the least concern in this great stent: at this juncture there was not even an emhasfador at Madrid. Marshal d'Harcourt had been recalled fix months before; the partition-treaty, which France was to support by her arms, having undered her minister highly obnoxious at the Spawith court. The French had now only at Madrid me of the secretaries to Harcourt's embassy, who managed their affairs. This man has, indeed, been fled envoy in all the gazettes, and histories genetally copied from thence; but there is certainly a wide difference betwixt real titles and those that are only nominal.

All Europe imagined, that the will of Charles II. had been intirely dictated by the court of Versailles: but the dying prince had wholly consulted the inof the strest of his kingdom, and the wishes, nay, even y had lears, of his subjects; for the French monarch had chosen ordered a body of troops to march to the frontiers

pani

th

itho

oug

ther

inif utw:

y m oliti vis

breig

his t

The

de g nem

BCCE. ther

pent Bour

the

fonte

of Spain; and these were to be commanded by th marshal d'Harcourt. Nothing, indeed, is mor true than this, that the reputation of Lewis, and the idea of his power, were the only negotiator which operated in this revolution. Charles of Au stria, after having signed the ruin of his own house and the grandeur of that of Bourbon, languishe about a month longer, and then ended his obscur life, in the thirty-ninth year of his age 1. Perhaps nor it may not be altogether useles, in order to sher mes fomewhat of human nature, to mention, that this monarch, a few months before his death, ordere the graves to be opened in the Escurial, of his father, mother, and first queen, Maria-Louisa of Or leans, who was suspected to have been poisoned by his command; as may be seen in the chapter of A necdotes; and he kiffed the remainder of their bodies In this he either followed the example of some and tient kings of Spain; or he was desirous to accuston himself to the horror of death; or had, perhaps, of a some secret superstitious notion, that the opening of the these tombs would retard his fatal hour.

The particulars of his will were kept fo fecret that the count de Harrac, embassador from his Imperial majesty, still flattered himself, that the archduke was nominated fucceffor: he waited, for there a considerable time, the issue of the grand county cil held immediately after the king's death; and the duke d'Abrantes at last approaching him with Le open arms, Harrac made then no doubt, that the leaty arch-duke was king; when the duke embracing tine him, said, Vengo ad expedir me de la casa de mi Austria; " I come to take my leave of the hould have

" of Austria."

Thus, after two hundred years spent in wars, the and fruitless negotiations, for only a part of the sould i October 1. 1700.

y the panish frontiers, the house of Bourbon by a dash and the pen, at last got the whole Spanish mo-an only, without treaties, wi hout cabals, and even ator whout the least hope of such a succession. We have a bught ourselves obliged to bring to light a fact therto darkened and missepresented by so many sishes instead and historians, blinded by prejudices, and some award appearances, which generally lead into naps nor. All that has been published in so many vo-shev mes, in relation to money spent on the occasion the mes, in relation to money ipent on the occasion this marshal d'Harcourt, and the Spanish ministers the marshed to procure this will, must be ranked amongst so distincted falshoods, and popular errors. The marshis de Torci, minister in France at that time for distruth, by a paper which I have under his hand. The king of Spain, in choosing for his successor e and be grandson of a king who had been so long his after the marshis and always his thoughts upon the effects of a general balance. The duke d'Anjou, grandnaps, of a general balance. The duke d'Anjou, grand-ngol in of Lewis XIV. was called to the Spanish mossilion, because he could have no expectation of ecret, theriting the crown of France; and the same testa-Im tent, which, in failure of a younger fon of the burbon family, nominated the archduke Charles, for therwards emperor Charles VI. expresly mentioncoun. that the Empire and Spain must never be united and the fame fovereign.

with Lewis XIV. might now either adhere to the at the saty of partition, by which France would be a sacing siner, or accept of the will so advantageous to his sailly. 'Tis certain, the matter was under delimited. But, of all his privy-council, chancellor station. But, of all his privy-council, chancellor statio vas i

ecea

ing

berla

ton

ers,

trou

eror

roth

be :

eem

ouse

tong

rho soing

omn

ot in

tear :

T

nin if

eive

Milar

witho

emy

om

Vaple

aily.

ry, t

lout

tror

Wi

tol

Ki

eur (

be er

aufe

trest

and, at his coming out of the council, meeting to princesses de Conti, and madame the duches "Well," said he, smiling, "which cous would you take, ladies?" Then without was ing their answer, "Which soever I follow," aded he, "I know I shall be blamed."

The actions of kings, though they themsel may be flattered, always undergo many severe co sures; insomuch that the king of England him had several bitter resections thrown out against in parliament; and his ministers were persecut for having made the treaty of partition. The English, who reason better than any people, who sometimes suffer their reason to be extinguish by sury and party-spirit, at once exclaimed again William, who made the treaty, and against Lew who broke it.

Europe seemed at first to be struck with amazement, and unable to exert herself, when she sate the monarchy of Spain become subject to Francher rival for three hundred years. Lewis XIV. a peared to be the happiest and most powerful an arch upon earth. He was now in his sixty-secon year, surrounded with a numerous offspring; a one of his grandsons was going to take upon he the sovereignty of Spain, America, half of Ita and the Netherlands. The emperor as yet condo nothing but complain.

King William, being become weak and infinithough only in the fifty-second year of his age, on not now appear a dangerous enemy: besides, must have the consent of his parliament to declar war. Lewis had sent over into England six million of livres, by the strength of which he stattered him self he should be able to gain a majority of votin his interest. William and the Dutch, not having a sufficient strength to declare themselves, wrote Philip V. as lawful king of Spain. Lewis XIV.

gt has secure of the elector of Bavaria, father to the help head going prince, who had been nominated was belands in the name of the late king Charles II.

once secured to Philip V. the possession of Flantonce lecured to Philip V. the possession of Flanars, and opened a passage for the French troops as a mough his electorate to Vienna, in case the emaror should declare war. The elector of Cologn, and the interest of France as his brother; and both and to be right in their judgment; for the muse of Bourbon was then incomparably the and how was duches of Savoy had one daughter, with was duches of Burgundy, and another now again ping to be queen of Spain: he himself was to me ammand the French armies in Italy; so that it was attimagined he would ever declare war against such man relations.

The duke of Mantua, who had been fold by his rance miltry to the French, now fold himself, and retived a French garifon into his dukedom. The Manese acknowledged the grandson of Lewis ithout hesitating: even Portugal, the natural emy of Spain, at first joined with her. In short, om Lisbon to Antwerp, and from the Danube to laples, all was in the interest of the Bourbon fa-lay. The king became so haughty upon his prospey, that, in speaking to the duke of Rochefaucault, tout some propositions made to him by the empetor, he used the following expression: "You

V.

ul a

feco

on h

f Ita

t cot

infir

ge,

declar will find them even more told they were."

King William, who was an enemy to the granKing William in the granKing Wil king William, who was an enemy to the gran-leur of Lewis XIV. even to his grave, promifed the emperor to arm England and Holland in his wrote and he likewise gained Denmark in his in-wrote self. In fine, he signed, at the Hague, a treaty which had been, for some time, concerted again the Bourbon family k: but the French monar & c was but little moved with this; and, reckoni upon the divisions which his money would make the English parliament, and still more upon t united strength of France and Spain, he despi his enemies.

M 2

About this Time, James died at St. Germains Upon his decease, Lewis immediately acknowled the prince of Wales as lawful king of England Had he not taken this step, 'tis very probable t parliament of England would not have intermedd betwixt the houses of Bourbon and Austria; least, several of the members of that parliam have so affured me: but thus to acknowlege their king a prince who had been profcribed them, appeared an infult to the nation, and an fecting to be arbitrary in Europe. This spirit liberty, which then reigned in England, bei heightened by their hatred of the power of Lev XIV. disposed the nation to give William whater subsidies he demanded.

The emperor Leopold first began the war in Ita in the spring of the year 1701. Italy has be generally the country which has felt most fro the ambition of the emperors: here it was that arms could most easily penetrate by the way of I rol and Venice; for this republic, tho' neutral appearance, was more inclined to the house of A stria than Bourbon: besides, she was obliged treaty to give a passage to the German troops; the accordingly performed her engagements will out the least reluctance.

The emperor waited till the Germanic bol should come over to his interest, before he wo attack Lewis on the fide of Germany. He had aty

ould

outch

s po

sbo

ersta

ing

efer

lew i

He

ionir

ente

a ho

br it

hat

eid to

dno

te a

He

e ha

eral.

T25 2

ever

de ne

o th dv.

ad k

noft

teak

nore

aps,

Dry

frenc tih

¹ September 16. 1701. k September 1700.

nty in Spain, and a correspondence there: but gain advantage could be reaped from thence, unonar is one of his sons was there in person. This coni sold not be effected without the aid of the ake buth and English fleets. King William did all in it is power to hasten the preparations: and though shody was weak, and almost lifeless, yet his unflanding, being still lively and active, put every ins ing in motion: but all he did was not so much plerve the house of Austria, as to humble that of glan Lewis XIV.

le t He was to have headed the allied army in the bele t Death, however, pre-He was to have headed the allied army in the beded iming of the year 1702. Death, however, premoted him in this design: he received a sall from all horse, which proved mortal to his decayed body; the historought on a slight sever, which carried him and the He died without giving the least answer to that the English priests, who were at his bed-side, irit alto him on the subject of religion; and he shewbeit and other uneasiness but that which arose from Leve the affairs of Europe.
The lest the reputation of a great politician, tho' whad never been popular; and a formidable gemal, tho' he had lost many battles. His conduct the salways discreet and moderate; and his spirits from the salways discreet and moderate; and his spirits from the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
from the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
from the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
from the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
from the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
from the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
the salways discreet and moderate is and his spirits
the salways discreet and moderate is an all the salways discreet and moderate is an all the salways discreet and moderate is an all the salways discreet and mo tralled. He was called stateholder of the English, of A was and king of the Dutch. He was acquainted with of the European languages, yet could not ; any one with elegance; for he was a man of with the judgment and reflection than imagination. He sected to shun all praise and flattery; because, perbody, Lewis appeared too fond of them. His work was of a quite different kind from that of the fory was of a quite different kind from that of the fench monarch. Those who are most pleased the character of a prince who acquired a kingdom M 3

party

had

tral

ed |

urbo

ß.

dtro

garif

rchy

orino

due

old r

ples dert

noft

agth

mtra

dead

10

pop!

ı,

ouf:

ne a

man

tia.

ore

2 ai

50

后 · 当

kingdom without a natural right; who maintain it without being beloved; who governed, and y did not enflave Holland; who was the foul a the chief of half of Europe; who had the geni of a general, and the valour of a common soldier who never persecuted any one for religion; wh despised all human superstition; and whose manne were simple and modest; such, no doubt, will gi the name of Great to William rather than Lewi Those, on the contrary, who are more charm with the pleasures of a splendid court; with ma nificence; with the protection given to Arts; wi zeal for the public good; with a passion for glor and a talent for reigning; who are more fruck wi the haughtiness with which the French ministe and generals, in obedience to their fovereign's wil added provinces to France; who are more affect with seeing a single kingdom withstand so man powers; in fhort, who admire more a monarch France, who gives the kingdom of Spain to h grandson, than a son-in-law who dethrones h father; fuch will certainly give the preference Lewis XIV.

William was fucceeded by the princess Anne daughter of King James II. by a daughter of charcellor Hyde, one of the greatest men in England The She was married to the prince of Denmark, who was only her greatest subject. As soon as she ascende the throne, she entered into all the measures of king has William, though she had had an open rupture with him when living. These measures were certainly the most agreeable to her people; and tho' a fove reign in any other kingdom may make his people blindly conform to his inclinations, yet, in England, a prince must comply with theirs.

The dispositions made by England and Holland in order, if possible, to put the archduke Charles on the throne of Spain, or at least to oppose the

Bourbons,

tain aurbons, deserve, perhaps the attention of all dy s. Holland was to maintain two hundred thoual a diroops, to be employed in the field, or to be kept geni garifons. This was more than the vast moldier schy of Spain could furnish at this juncture. A who wince of merchants, which had been almost totally anne dued in two months, about thirty years before, ll gi uld now do more than the sovereigns of Spain, lewi uples, Flanders, Peru, and Mexico. England arm pertook to furnish forty thousand. In alliances it may most always happens, that the parties furnish at wit best helps than they promised; England, on the glory murary, in the second year of the war, sent sisty with the dead of forty thousand men; and towards the of the war, she maintained, of her own nops, and those of her allies, upon the frontiers france, in Spain, in Italy, in Ireland, in Amemany a, and in her fleets, two hundred and twenty wofand foldiers and failors: an expence which will mear incredible to one who confiders, that Engad, properly speaking, is but equal to a third of rance, and has not half so much money in specie: tat commerce and credit can do. The English me always the greatest burden in this alliance. he Dutch lightened theirs by degrees: for, in ality, the republic of the states general are only illustrious company of merchants; but England arich and fertile kingdom, abounding in statesmen, merals, and foldiers.

The emperor was to furnish twenty-four thou-fove ad men, exclusive of the assistance of the Emeople ie, and those allies whom he expected to detach land, him the Bourbon family. Meanwhile the grandn of France reigned peaceably at Madrid; and land lewis seemed now at the height of his power and arles dory. But those, who could penetrate the secrets the courts of Europe, especially that of France,

MA

wil fecte

rch c

to h s h

ce t

Anne chan

land O Wa

ende

king

with

ainly

burf

ll th igou

equil

er i

vas 1 nd !

be fi

desty

Cyr,

ng h mha

a we had b

his o

bimf

aid

" I

" a

chos

war,

ar

Ir

Were

dors their

tion

began to apprehend a change. Spain, which heierci been greatly weakened under the late kings of blood of Charles V. became more so in the ginning of the reign of a fon in the Bourbon mily. The house of Austria had partisans in se ral provinces of this monarchy. Catalonia feem ready to shake off the new yoke, and to ded for the archduke Charles. It was impossible conceive, that Portugal would not, fooner or la espouse the cause of the Austrian family. It peared her interest to blow up amongst the S niards, who were her natural enemies, a civil w by which Lisbon must be a considerable gain The duke of Savoy, though but just become ther-in-law to the king of Spain, and allied to Bourbon family both by blood and treaties, yet peared already diffatisfied with his fon-in-law. had at first a monthly pension of fifty thousand crowns, which was augmented to two hundred thou fand livres; but this did not appear to him sufficient to keep him in the Bourbon interest. He wante at least to have Montferrat, and part of Mile given up to him. The haughty treatment he experienced from the French generals, and the minite of Verfailles, gave him reason to suspect, that he sign would foon be difregarded by his fons-in-law, who arig furrounded his dominions on all sides. He had a ready fuddenly quitted the empire for France; and it was now highly probable, that, being all tels neglected by France, he would desert her the fint opportunity.

In the court and kingdom of Lewis XIV. people of penetration already foresaw a revolution, which Mai those of less discernment cannot perceive till the tad event itself happens. The king, now above fixty years of age, and being more retired, could not am fo well distinguish the characters of men. He kat faw things at too great a distance, with eyes less piercing

of

e b

n

fe een

ecl ole

lat

lt

S W

ain

ne I

hercing than before, and bewitched by a long purse of prosperity. Madam de Maintenon, with the great qualities the possessed, had neither that igour, that resolution, nor that greatness of soul, quisite to support the glory of a state. It was by made superintendant of the finances, in 1698.

In secretary at war, in 1701. He was more of he fine gentleman than the minister: but the mothy of his conduct, when he was governor of St. lyr, had pleased the king: however, notwithstanding his outward modesty and diffidence, he was so mhappy as to think his strength sufficient to support weight, which Colbert and Louvois both together to the bottom with difficulty. The king relying upon the bisown experience, believed he should be able timself to direct his ministers successfully. He had to king James, upon the death of Louvois; thou "I have lost a good minister; but this shall not shall affect either your affairs or mine." When he wante those Barbesieux to succeed Louvois as secretary at Mila, war, "I made your father a minister," said he; experand I will make you one too." He said much inite the same to Chamillard. A king, indeed, who had hat he signed fo long, and fo successfully, seemed to have who tright to speak in this manner.

ad all In regard to the generals he employed, they ance; were frequently too much confined by the ffrictg allo wis of their orders; as were likewise his embassane sultant to deviate in the least from their instructions. He was to find beir instructions. He used to settle the operapeople tions of the campaign with Chamillard in madam which Maintenon's apartment: and if a commander inill the anded any great enterprize, he must frequently send e fixty courier for permission; and before his reum, the opportunity was lost, or the general defeated.

d not

ercing

He es les

M 5

Honours

The

E

di

bo

ye

DE

of C

TTO

ETTE

Man

tis :

born

100

TOU:

let .

ď (

250

Honours and military rewards were lavished in the most inconsiderate manner, under the ministry of Chamillard. Young men, and even children were allowed to purchase regiments; whilst, a mong the enemy, a regiment was the reward of twenty years fervice. This difference was after wards very fenfibly felt, on feveral occasions, where an experienced colonel might have prevented a de-In the year 1693, the king first created knights of St. Lewis; an order which he instituted on purpose to raise an emulation in his officers, and as an honourable reward for military bravery; but the crosses of this order were sold as soon as Chamillard began his ministry: and they might be bough at the war-office for fifty crowns. Military dif cipline, which is the very foul of an army, and which had been so strictly preserved by Louvois was now shamefully neglected. The proper number of foldiers was not kept up in the companies nor that of the officers in the regiments. The ea finess of having an understanding with the commitfaries, and the remissness of the minister, produced this disorder. The inconveniencies of which, had other circumstances concurred, must have occasion ed the loss of battles: for, in order to have a from of as great extent as that of the enemy, they were obliged to oppose thin battalions to those that were strong and numerous. The magazines were now neither sufficiently supplied, nor kept in readiness and the arms were not properly tempered. Those persons, therefore, who saw these defects in the government, and who knew what generals France would have to encounter, were afraid for her, even amidst those first advantages, which seemed to promile her greater success than ever.

6

in

n. 2 0

er ere

ted

ted and but

ha

gh

dif

and

ois

ım.

ies

63

mi

uce

had

ion

ron

were

were

ron

es I

hole

rance

A P

CHAPTER XVII.

The war in 1701. the conduct of prince Eugene, of marshal de Villeroi, the duke de Vendome, the duke of Marlborough, and marshal de Villars, the year 1703.

THE first general who gave a check to the su-I periority of France, was a Frenchman; for bwe must reckon prince Eugene, altho' a grandson of Charles-Emanuel duke of Savoy. His father, to settled in France, was a lieutenant-general, and premor of Champagne: He married Olimpia-Marcini, one of cardinal Mazarin's nieces. From tis marriage, in other respects unfortunate, was mm at Paris a this prince, fo fatal afterwards to Lewis XIV. and so little known to him in his buth. He was at at first stiled in France the chevale de Carignan. He folicited the king for a fingle mop of horse; but he met with a refusal, because thippened to be so nearly related to the princes d Conti, then in disgrace at court. He then enmed into holy orders, and affumed the title of abof Savoy: he petitioned for an abbey, and is was also denied him. In short, finding that Livis XIV, would neither promote him in the the much, nor the army, he went to serve the emperor minst the Turks in Hungary, in the year 1684. even accompany with the princes of Conti, who had alprof made a glorious campaign in that service. he king fent orders to the princes of Conti, and a October 1663.

be fo

the !

gen

plan

tren

mai

pall

W2:

wil

Th

of

COE

mo

the cul

rei

9

D

di

1

035

N

b

0

1

L

0.0

...

8...

those who accompanied them in this expedition that they should return. The abbot of Savoy was th only person who did not obey: he continued hi route, declaring that he renounced France for ever When the king was informed of this, he faid to hi courtiers, smiling, " Don't you think I suffer " great loss? All the courtiers, indeed, looke upon him as one of an unfettled mind, and wh would never be capable of any great undertaking But they framed their judgment on some sallies d youth, which ought never to fix our opinions of men. This prince, tho' held in such contempt at the French court, was born with the qualities requific to make a great warrior, and an able statesman. His understanding was clear and elevated, and his resolution such as was necessary in the field, and the cabinet. He has committed mistakes, as all general have done; but his overfights were effaced by the number of his great actions. He humbled the grandeur of Lewis XIV. and governed the Empire: and, in the whole course of his victories and administration, he shewed an equal contempt of pride and riches. He even cultivated letters, and encouraged them as much as he could, at the court of Vienna. He was now in the thirty-feventh year of his age; having derived great experience from his victories over the Turks, and the mistakes of the Imperialists in the late wars, wherein he had served against France. He made a descent upon Italy by the bishoprick of Trent, and the territories of Venice, at the head of thirty thousand men; having a full power to pursue what measures he thought proper. The French court, at first, ordered marshal Catinat not to oppose the passage of prince Eugene either not choosing to offer the first act of hostility which was certainly bad policy, when they had an army in readiness; or to avoid giving offence to the Venetians, who were, however, not so much to be feared as the German army. This falle step of the court made Catinat run into many others; for a general feldom succeeds, when obliged to follow a plan not his own. Besides, it must be allowed exremely difficult, in such a country, divided by so many rivers, and branches of rivers, to hinder the passage of a skilful enemy, such as prince Eugene was; who, to a profound depth of design, joined likewife a furprising quickness and activity in execution. The nature of the ground too, adjacent to the banks of the Adige, was fuch, that the Imperialists were confined, whill the French were scattered; and more extended. Catinat was for passing over to the enemy; but his lieutenant-generals started difficulties, and formed cabals against him : he had not resolution enough to force them to a compliance with his orders; and this omission, arising from the moderation of his temper, proved a fatal misconduft. Eugene first attacked the post of Corpi, near the canal Bianco, defended by M. St. Fremont; who, not conforming exactly to the orders of his general, was dislodged, and driven from this important station. After this success, the Germans became masters of all the country betwixt the Adige and Adda; they even penetrated into the territory of Bresciano, and Gatinat retired behind the Oglio. Most of the best officers approved of this retreat as extremely prudent; nay we must likewise add, that the want of ammunition, which the government had promised, but neglected to send, rendered it absolutely necessary. The courtiers, especially thole who hoped to supplant Catinat in his command, exclaimed against his conduct, as a reproach to the French name. The marshal de Villeroi undertook to retrieve the honour of the nation. The confidence with which he spoke, and the affection the king had for him, accordingly procured this general the command in Italy; and the marshal de

17 tion s th

s the l hi

o hi er oke

who king

t the

nan. d his d the

erals y the

the Em-

and count

ar of his the

rved y by

Veving ught

riha ene

ility, d 21 ce to

ch to

confe

o th

ifthe

paigr

roy,

in hi

tack.

and "

16 O

intre

the l

with

deat

whe

101 this give

out

mai

the

flee

gre he lies

anc

itte inf

to abi

112

dr

in

Catinat, notwithstanding his victories at Staffords and Marseilles, was obliged to serve under him.

The marshal duke de Villeroi was son to the king's preceptor; and, having been brought up with him, was always highly in his favour. He had been a companion to him in all his campaigns, as well as pleasures. He was a man of an agreeable and charming person, courageous, honourable, friendly, sociable, and magnificent in every thing: but his enemies said, that, at the head of an army, he was more taken up with the honour and pleasure of commanding, than busied in the designs of a great general. They likewise reproached him with such an obstinate attachment to his own opinions, that he never followed the advice of any other person.

He came into Italy to give orders to marshal de Catinat, and to add to the difgust of the duke of Savoy. His behaviour shewed, that he thought a favourite of Lewis XIV. at the head of a powerful army, greatly above a prince. He called him only Savoy; treating him as a general in the pay of France, and not as a fovereign who was lord of the barriers which nature had fixed betwixt France and Italy. The friendship of this prince was certainly not so fegarded, as seemed necessary. The court imagined, that fear alone would be a sufficient tie to keep him in her interest; and that a French army, by which about fix or feven thousand Piedmontese troops were continually furrounded, would warrant his fidelity. Marshal Villeroi behaved to him as his superior in command, and his equal in other respects. The duke of Savoy had the empty title of generalissimo, and the marshal had the sole authority. His first order was, that they should attack prince Eugene, posted at Chiari near Oglio. The general officers were of opinion, that such a step would be contrary to all the rules of war, for very strong reasons: the post was in itielf of no consequence,

da

g's

m,

1 a

as

nd

ly,

his 725

of

eat

ich

he

de

of

ta

ful

a-

e,

ers

ly.

fo

12-

to

ıy,

ele

11-

im

in ty

ole

ıld

0.

for

no

e,

onsequence, and the intrenchments inaccessible; that they could gain nothing by carrying it, and, they failed, would lose the reputation of the campaign. Villeroi peremptorily told the duke of Saroy, he must march; and he sent an aid-de-camp, in his name, to order marshal Catinat on the attack. Catinat made him repeat the order thrice; and then turning to the officers under his command. " Come then, gentlemen," faid he, " we must " obey." They accordingly marched up to the attenchments . The duke of Savoy behaved, at he head of his troops, not like a man distatisfied with France: Catinat fought as if he fought for death: he was wounded, and, in this condition, when he faw the king's troops repulsed, and Villetoi not giving orders, he made a retreat. After this, he left the army, and came to Versailles, to eive an account of his conduct to the king, without complaining of any person.

Prince Eugene always kept the Superiority over marshal Villeroi. At last, in the midst of winter, in the year 1702. one night, when the marshal was afleep, in the utmost security, in Cremona, a town of great strength, and defended by a numerous garison, he was suddenly awaked by the noise of several vollies of musquet-shot: he rose in the utmost hurry, and mounted his horse. The first thing that presents itself to him, is a squadron of the enemy: he is instantly taken prisoner, and conducted out of the town, not knowing what passed there, nor being able to imagine the cause of this surprising event. Prince Eugene was already in Cremona. A priest, named Bozzoli, provost of St. Maria Neuf, had let in the Germans by a common fewer: four hundred foldiers, having by this means been conveyed into the prieft's house had killed the guards at the

^{*} September 11, 1701.

have

who

wer

this

pea

thro

on acc

con

que

0116

we

har

and

fei

en

Wa

da

ha

m

So

01

0 fo

ha

2

b

two gates; and these being opened, prince Eugene entered with four thousand men. All this had been done, before the governor, who was a Spaniard, could have the least suspicion, and before Villero awaked. The preparations for this enterprize had been carried on with the utmost secrecy, order, diligence, and precaution. The Spanish governor first appeared in the streets, with some soldiers; but was killed by a musquet-shot; and all the general officers shared the same fate, or were taken prisoners, except count de Revel, the lieutenant-general, and the marquis de Pralin. Chance, however, defeated all the prudence of prince Eugene.

The chevalier d'Entragues was that same day to have a review of his regiment of marines: they had accordingly affembled by four o'clock in the morning, at one end of the town, precifely at the time when prince Eugene entered at the other. D'Entragues hurried into the streets with his men. and furiously attacked the Germans. By this means, the rest of the garison had some time to come together. The officers and foldiers thronged into the streets, and public places, in the utmost confusion; fome half-armed, and others half naked, without a commander, and without order. They fought in the greatest distraction, running from street to street, and from one square to another. Two Irish regiments, part of the garison, at last put a stop to the fury of the Imperialists. Never was any town furprised with greater art and stratagem, nor any defended with so much valour. The garison consisted of five thousand men: prince Eugene had yet brought into the town but four thousand: a considerable detachment of his army was to have come by a bridge over the Po. His measures had been concerted with great prudence; but another mifchance intirely defeated them. This bridge, guarded only by about an hundred French foldiers, was to have

17 gene beer

iard,

lero

had

di

rno

; but nera

fon-

ral

de

y to

hey

the

the

er.

ien,

ins.

to-

the

n;

it a

in

et,

gi-

the

ır.

e-

ted

ret

ſi-

ne

en

if-

ed

to

ve

have been first seized by the German cuirassiers, who, as foon as prince Eugene entered the town, were accordingly ordered upon that exploit. this purpose, as they had come in at the south-gate, nearest the common sewer, they must now pass brough the Po-gate towards the field of Cremona, on the fouth fide, and thence to the bridge. They accordingly hastened thither; but the guide, who conducted them, happening to be killed by a mulquet-shot from a window, the cuirassiers mistook one street for another; and thus the way and time were protracted. In this short interval, the Irish, having rushed to the Po-gate, furiously attacked and repulsed the cuirassiers. The marquis de Pralin seized this opportunity, and ordered the bridge to Thus the reinforcement which the be cut down. enemy expected, could not advance, and the town was faved,

Prince Eugene, after having fought the whole day, and having been always mafter of the gate he had entered, at last retreated; carrying with him marshal Villeroi, and several general officers, prifoners; but failed in carrying Cremona, which his own activity and prudence, joined to the negligence of the governor, had put into his hands, and which fortune, and the bravery of the French and Irish, had taken from him.

Marshal Villeroi, who was extremely unfortunate on this occasion, was exclaimed against by the courtiers at Versailles with great bitterness; which is not to be wondered at, considering his character, his high station, and the share he had always had of the royal favour. The king, who blamed, but did not reproach, him, was highly provoked that every one fo much condemned his choice; and, on this occasion, he said, "They are "thus outrageous against him, because he is my " favourite;" an expression he never used towards any

ffairs lad ev

means

resfari

mder even

mend

ing to the af

ry IV even

of.

Bu

of ad

ried

furpt

tho'

men

Was

Te I

don

tod

felf

boa

rec

gra

du

Bo

em

th

the

fe

be any person, but this once, during his whole life. The duke de Vendome was now named to the command in Italy.

The duke de Vendome, grandson of Henry IV. was, like him, bold and intrepid, affable in his temper, benevolent in his disposition, without pride, hatred, envy, or revenge. His behaviour was haughty only to princes, but easy and condescending to every body elfe. He was the only general, under whom the foldiers did not go to battle from a notion of duty, or prompted by that animal instinct, and mechanical enthusiasm, which leads them on to obey the commands of their officers: they fought for the duke of Vendome and would have facrificed their lives to retrieve any falle step, which he was fometimes led into by the precipitancy of his temper. He was thought not to concert his defigns with fo much depth as prince Eugene; nor did he fo well understand the art of providing subsistence for armies. He neglected all œconomy, and allowed the military discipline to relax. His table and bed engroffed too much of his time; which was likewise the case of his brother. His effeminacy often brought him into danger of being surprised; but, on the day of action, he retrieved all by a presence of mind, and quickness of parts, which seemed to rise in proportion to the danger. He always distinguished himself most in action; and this he always fought for; being, as was faid, not so well qualified as prince Eugene for a defensive war, but, in every respect, as well formed for an offensive one.

His disorder and negligence was not confined to the army; for it prevailed to a surprising excess in his house; nay, even in his person; and, from an aversion to pride and oftentation, he ran into such a cynical slovenliness as can hardly be paralleled. His disinterestedness, one of the most noble virtues, became in him a fault; for he kept no account of his affairs; fairs; and by this want of order, loft more than he ad ever bestowed in acts of liberality: nay, by this neans, he was often even pinched for common neeffaries. His brother, the grand prior, who served mder him in Italy, had all the same imperfections men to a greater excess, and for which he made anends by the same valour. It was certainly astonishng to see two generals often a-bed at four o'clock in he afternoon; and two princes, grandfons of Hen-VIV. funk into fuch a neglect of their persons, as men the meanest people would have been ashamed

But what is more furprifing still, is that mixture of activity and indolence, with which Vendome carned on a war against Eugene, so full of stratagems, surprizes, marches, passages of rivers, dangerous, ho' unserviceable skirmishes, and bloody engagements, where both sides claimed the victory: such was that of Luzara ; upon the account of which Te Deum was sung at Vienna as well as Paris. Venome generally came off victorious when he had not todo with Eugene in person; but when Eugene himfilf commanded, then France had little reason to life.

Ch. 17.

17.

the

IV.

his

ide,

Was

ing

der

ion

and ey

for

ed

ras

n.

ns

he

ce

ed

nile

en on

of

le

1-

ys

ed

y

0

n

n

a S

S

Amidst these battles, and sieges of so many fortifed cities, and little towns, the court of Versailles received secret intelligence, that the duke of Savoy, grandson of Lewis XIII. and father-in-law to the auke of Burgundy, and Philip V. had quitted the Bourbon interest, and was gone over to that of the imperor. They were aftonished, and enraged, at his hus forfaking at once his two fons-in-law, and, as they imagined, his own interest. But the emperor promised all the French had refused him; Montterrat, Mantua, Alexandria, Valencia, the country Detwixt the Po and Tenaro, and more money also d August 15. 1702.

Moro

then

confe

have to the

narch

Tha

Chri

hanc

fucc

to th

rece

rous

man for rec

WI

der

ho

at his

w

lec

joi

W

ch

gi

1

than France had allowed him. This money, how. ever, was to be furnished by the English; for the emperor could not pay his own army but with great difficulty. England, the richest of the allies, contributed more than all of them to the public cause. Whether the duke of Savoy, by this step, violated the laws of nations, and those of nature, is a question in morality, which has but little effect on the conduct of princes. The event shewed, in the end, that in this treaty, he had at least not failed in the laws of policy: but he failed in another effential point, in leaving his troops to the mercy of the French, while he was in treaty with the emperor. The duke de Vendome ordered them to be difarmed e: they were not, indeed, above five thousand men; but this was no inconfiderable number for the duke of Savoy.

Scarce had the house of Bourbon lost this ally, when she was informed, that the king of Portugal had likewise declared against her. Don Pedro, the Portuguese monarch, acknowleged the archduke Charles king of Spain. The Imperial council, in the name of the archduke, who had not one town in Spain, divided this monarchy in favour of Pedro II. giving up to him, by one of those treaties which were never put into execution, Vigo, Bayonne, Alcantara, Badajox, part of Estramadura, and all that country situated on the west of the Silver river in America: in a word, Charles gave away what he had not, in order that he might acquire what he could in Spain.

The king of Portugal, prince Darmstadt minister to the archduke, and the admirante of Castille, his partisan, even solicited the assistance of the emperor of Morocco. They not only made treaties with these barbarians for horses and corn, but likewise petitioned for troops. Muley Ismael, emperor of August 19. 1703.

Morocco,

W-

he

eat

n-

ſe.

ed

on

n-

nat

WS

in ile

de

ere

as

ly,

gal

the

ke

in

wn

ro

ich

A1-

hat

in

he

he

fer

his

ror

ith

vise of Morocco, the most warlike and politic potentate then amongst the Mahometan nations, would not consent to send troops, but upon terms that would have been dangerous to Christendom, and shameful the king of Portugal. He demanded this monarch's fon as an hostage, and certain towns also. That treaty, therefore, did not take effect; and the Christians tore one another to pieces with their own hands, without the help of those barbarians. fuccours from Africa would have availed but little to the house of Austria, in comparison of that she received from England and Holland.

Churchill, earl, and afterwards duke, of Marlborough, who was declared general of the Dutch and English forces in 1702. proved the most fatal man to the grandeur of France, that had appeared for many ages. He was not as those generals, who receive from the ministry a plan of the campaign in writing, and who, after having executed their orders at the head of an army, return to folicit the honour of being continued in their command. at that time, governed the queen of England, by his being so necessary a person, and by the influence which his wife had over her majesty. He intirely led the parliament by his own power and interest, joined to that of Godolphin, the lord treasurer, whose fon was married to his daughter. master of the court, the parliament, and the exchequer, more a king than William had been, as great a politician, and a much greater captain, he did more than the allies could expect. He had, to a degree above all the generals of his time, that calm courage in the midst of tumult, that ferenity of foul in danger, which the English call a cool head; tête froide. And it was perhaps this quality, the greatest gift of nature for command, which formerly gave the English so many advantages

Ch

of his

det

arm

lear

he

He

but

COU Enj

ma fro

cer

ku

me

tio

bei

00 gr (

fer

gu

ha

pr

ter

tages over the French in the plains of Poitiers

Creffy, and Agincourt.

Marlborough, who was an indefatigable warrio during the campaign, in winter acted the part of an able negotiator. He went to the Hague, and al the courts in Germany. He persuaded the Dutch to exert their utmost to humble France. roused the resentment of the elector Palatine. He went likewise to flatter the haughty elector of Brandenbourg, when this prince wanted to be king: he ferved him at table, in order to procure of him a supply of seven or eight thousand men. Prince Eugene, on his part, no sooner finished one campaign than he went directly for Vienna, to make preparation for another: and it cannot but appear evident, how much better an army must subsist. when the general himself acts as the minister. These two great men, who sometimes jointly commanded, and sometimes separately, lived always in a good understanding: they had frequent conferences at the Hague with the grand pensionary Heinfius, the minister who governed Holland in conjunction with secretary Fagel, with as much sagacity as the Barnevelts and de Witts, and with better fortune. These three statesmen so concerted measures, that they put the springs of half Europe in motion, against the house of Bourbon. French ministry was then too weak to resist long They always kept the plan of fuch united force. the operations of the campaign a profound secret. They themselves concerted their designs, and never communicated them even to those whose affistance was necessary, till on the point of execution. Chamillard, on the contrary, being no politician, no warrior, nor even well versed in the public revenues, was greatly unequal to the part of a prime minister. His own incapacity to concert measures, made him therefore have recourse to the affistance of

ers

rio

ar

al

itch

H

He

0

be

ure

en!

one

akc

ear

fift.

ter.

ms in

fe-

ary

in

ſa.

vith

rted

cpe

The

ong

of

ret.

ver

nce

ha-

no

ies,

res,

nce of of many inferior persons; so that, by this means, his secrets often transpired even before he had fully determined what particular course to take.

As foon as Marlborough commanded the allied amy in Flanders, he made it appear, that he had learned the art of war from Turenne, under whom he had served his first campaign as a volunteer. He went, in the French army, by no other name but that of the handsome Englishman: but the viscount de Turenne had judged, that the handsome Englishman would one day come forth a very great man. He began his command with advancing from obscurity subaltern officers, in whom he disemed merit, without confining himself to the order of the military roll, which we call in France Pordre ha tableau. He knew, that when steps of advancement are only the consequence of seniority, emulation is extinguished; and that the oldest is far from being always the best officer. He formed men at once. When he came into the field, he gained gound considerably on the French, even without fighting. The first month of the campaign, count d'Atlone, the Dutch general, disputed the command; but, on the second d, was obliged to yield to him in every respect. The French monarch had ant against him his grandson the duke of Burgundy, a wife and just prince, born to make men happy. The marshal de Bousters, a brave and indefatigable general, commanded under this young prince. But the duke, after having in vain attempted to take feveral places, and having been forced to retreat, by the excellent marches of the English, returned to Versailles in the middle of the campaign. Bouflers now remained alone a spectator of the success of Marlborough, who took

maf

most

rerfa

iis r

force

wee

his

mari

gain

kqu

oull

0 ting

him,

" y

the !

rich

11 0

ed t

100

mit

men

beac

ufte:

win

nn

mer

thot

for

1 5

rin

ie p

Venlo, Ruremonde, and Liege, always advancing and never for a moment quitting his superiority.

Marlborough, at his return to London after this campaign, received all the honours that could be conferred either by a monarchy or republic; he was created a duke by the queen, and, which was still more grateful, received the thanks of both houses of parliament, who sent a deputation of their number to wait upon him at his house for that purpose.

Nevertheless there still appeared a man who seem ed designed to be a bulwark to the glory of France This was marshal duke de Villars, then only a lieutenant-general, but soon afterwards generalissimoo the armies of France, Spain, and Sardinia, when it the cighty-second year of his age. He raised him. felf by an obstinacy which he always shewed in act ing beyond his commission. He sometimes displeal ed Lewis, and, which was more dangerous, Louvois for he spoke to them with the same boldness as he They reproached him, that he had not modefly becoming his valour. But, however, per ceiving he had a genius for war, and was formed for conducting a French army, after having neglected him a confiderable number of years, they now promoted him.

There was hardly any man whose fortune occasioned more murmuring and jealousy, and yet no one ever gave less occasion for it. He had, indeed, been created a marshal of France, a peer of the realm, and governor of a province: but then he had saved the state; while others, who had almost ruined it, or those who had been only mere courtiers, had received very near the same recompences. They even reproached him with his riches, which he had acquired by contributions levied in the enemy's country, the lawful, tho' inadequate, reward of his valour and good conduct; whilst those, who had amassed

ing

thi

1 6

h

wa

oot

0 tha

em

ice.

ieu.

00

n in

im

act.

eal

ois

s he

ot a

per.

med

neg-

hey

cca

no

eed.

the

had

ined

had

even

ac-

oun-

va-

had

fed

massed fortunes ten times more considerable by the most scandalous practices, possessed them with unitersal approbation. He had not begun to enjoy is reputation before his eightieth year; and he was forced to outlive the whole court, to taste the full weets of his glory.

It may not be unnecessary to give the reason of his injustice in the public. It was because the marshal de Villars had no art: he knew not how to make the mass with his good tense and honesty; nor to equire esteem by speaking of himself so advantageunly as he deserved to be spoken of by others.

One day, when he went to pay his respects to the ing, before he set out for his command, he to do im, before all the court: "Sir, I am going to sight your majesty's enemies: and I leave you surrounded with mine." He said to the courtiers, who, in the regency of the duke of Orleans, had amassed with the source of the duke of Orleans, had amassed with the source of the sexpressions, wherein he shewdown enemies." His expressions, wherein he shewdown the same courage as in his actions cast too great stontempt on others, who were already sufficiently intated by his good fortune.

At the beginning of this war, he was one of those leutenant-generals who commanded the detackments in Alface. The prince of Baden was at the lead of the Imperialists, and had taken Landau, there a defence of four months by Melac. This mince continued his progress, having the advantage anumbers, in the ground, and in a successful commencement of the campaign. His army was among those mountains of Brisgau adjoining to the Black stress, which imments forest separated the Bavarian from the French troops. Catinat commanded then a Strasbourg; but he was too cautious to attack he mince of Baden at such great disadvantage: for, had the proved unsuccessful, the French army would have to I.

Ma A jo nem

atif

ying

Vil

lov

prin

e of

Wed

at th

the

le he

in th

ear I

Hars

and

dwe!

d m

plied

than

batt

ofior

ach to H

you

port

Wit

ately

ough

been irrecoverably lost, and Alface laid open. Vil lars, who had resolved to be a marshal of France or to die in the attempt, ventured what Catinat ha not dared to attempt. Having obtained permission from court, he marched against the Imperialist with an army inferior to theirs, and engaged then near Friedlingen, which gave name to the battle. The cavalry engaged in the plain; and the French infantry, after having clambered up to the fumm of the mountains, attacked that of the German intrenched in the woods.

I have heard the Marshal de Villars say mo than once, that after the battle was gained, as was marching at the head of his infantry, a voi called out, " We are undone." Upon hearing this, all his regiments fled. He ran after then calling out, " Come back, my friends; the vis " tory is ours: Long live the king." The fo diers answered, " Long live the king," trembling and still continued to fly. The greatest difficult which the general had was to rally the conqueror Had only two of the enemy's regiments appeara during this panic, the French would have been defeated: so often does mere chance decide the fat of battles.

The prince of Baden loft three thousand men, with all his artillery; and after being driven from the field, was purfued fix miles across the wood As a farther proof of his defeat, the and defiles. fort of Friedlingen capitulated; yet, notwitte standing all this, he sent word to Vienna, that he had gained a victory; and a Te Deum was fung, more shameful to him than the defeat he had suffered.

The French soldiers, as soon as they had recovered from their panic, proclaimed Villars a mashal of France in the field of battle; and, about fortnight after, the king confirmed what had been shift given him by the voice of the foldiers. Marshal tot

il

Cd na

io

ft.

er e.

nd

m an

10

s I

oi

ri

en

vic

ing;

culy

rors

earco

de-

fate

men,

V00

, the

With-

ne had

ed.

reco-

Marshal Villars, with his victorious troops, at fjoined the elector of Bavaria f; whom he found florious on his fide, having gained ground of the my, and being master of the Imperial city of tilbon, where the diet of the empire had been ying schemes for his destruction.

Villars was rather formed to serve his country by lowing his genius, than by acting in concert with pince. He led, or rather forced the elector on eother side of the Danube: but, after they had fed the river, the elector repented it; perceiving, athe least misfortune would expose his dominions the emperor's mercy. The count de Styrum, at thead of twenty thousand men, was then going to in the formidable army of the prince of Baden, Tonawert. "We must prevent this," said lars to the prince; " we must march instantly, foland attack Styrum." The elector hesitated, and fwered, that he would confer with his generals ministers. " I am your minister and general," alled Villars: " do you want any other counsel han mine, when the question is about giving battle ?" The prince, being full of appresions for his dominions, was still averse to the ach general's proposal, and not a little displeased bim. "Well then," said Villars, "if from your electoral highness will not seize this opportunity with your Bavarians, I will engage with the French;" and accordingly he immetely gave orders for the attack. The elector, high he was moved with indignation *, and more f April 1703.

a mar- All these particulars are in the manuscript copy of bout 3 coirs, written by marshal Villars, which I have read. been thirt printed volume of these Memoirs is certainly his farshal tot like the first.

looked

ern

in (

pate

T

m3

ottle

leve

h th

had c

nd !

te C looked upon Villars as extremely rash, yet sou himself under a kind of necessity to fight again his inclination. They engaged in the plains

Hochstet, near Donawert 5.

After the first charge, there was a remarkable is stance of the power of fortune in battles. The French army, and that of the enemy, were be seized with a panic; both at once betook themselves to slight, and marshal Villars was lest almost alone for some minutes in the field of battle: however, after some difficulty, he rallied his troops led them again to the charge, and gained the vectory. Three thousand of the Imperialists was killed, four thousand were taken prisoners, and they lost all their artillery and baggage. The elector got possession of Ausbourg; and the root to Vienna being now laid open, it was debated in the emperor's council, whether he should quit his capital.

The emperor's consternation was excusable; for he was then every-where worsted. The duke of Burgundy, with the marshals Tallard and Vauban under him, had made himself master of old Brisac. Tallard had not only retaken Landau, but had likewise deseated the prince of Hesse, afterwards king of Sweden, near Spires, when he came to releve that city. If we may believe the marquis de Feuquieres, that officer and judge so well skilled in the military art, but so severe in his opinions, marsha Tallard gained this battle by a mistake and oversight. In his letter from the field of battle to his majely, he had these words: "Sir, your army has taken more standards and colours than it has lost com-

France having been thus successful in Germany it might be supposed Villars would push the success

" mon foldiers."

gain

dent

[&]amp; September 20. 1703.

. I

fou

ns

ne vice roac

ld quit

e; for uke of

Brifac.

d like-

s king relieve

e Fen-

uch farther, considering the impetuosity of his fou mper, so formed to disconcert the slowness of the gair mans: but that particular quality, which made nso formidable a general, rendered him intolerthe to the elector of Bavaria. The king defired agenerals should behave haughtily to none but an many; and the elector of Bavaria was so unformate as to demand another marshal of France. them. Thus, not with standing Villars was so necessary almos man in Germany, where he had gained two how miles, and, in all probability, would have overwered the emperor; yet he was fent into the grennes, to quell an infurrection amongst the went matry-people. We shall speak of these fanatics he chapter upon religion. But Lewis XIV. nd more irreconcileable, than the inhabitants of ebater de Cevennes.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Tauban The defeat at Blenheim, or Hochstet; and its consequences.

THE duke of Marlborough returned to the Netherlands in the beginning of the year 1703. here his conduct and success were equally given here his conduct and success were equally here had taken Bonne, the residence of the elector states of Cologne: thence he proceeded to Huy, which he hajely ok, as also Limbourg; and made himself master fall the circle of the lower Rhine. The martial de Villeroi, as soon as he was set at liberty, the control of the lower had been but he was not more there his conduct and success were equally great. mmanded in Flanders; but he was not more fucces sinft prince Eugene. The marshal de Boussers id, indeed, got a small advantage, with a detachment of the army, at the battle of Eckern, against N 3 Obdam much

the I

butio

M

the I

fentl

he vi

Mar

men

and

A

and .

met

when

befo

renn

army

litua

man

lars

in-la

polit

ter v

T

Mec

fixty

thou

plete

hund

kon

mies

than

battl

gene

the p

ande

the e

Obdam the Dutch general; but this was attended with no advantages; and therefore was of no consequence.

Mean while, if the English general had n marched to the affistance of the emperor, 'tis pre bable the house of Austria would have been intire The elector of Bavaria was master Paffau: thirty thousand French, under marshal de Marsin, who had succeeded Villars, covered the country on the other fide of the Danube; and parties made frequent incursions into Austria. Vienna was, on one side, threatened by the French and Bavarians, and, on the other, by prince Ragoille. at the head of the Hungarians, fighting for the liberty, and supported by the treasure of France, as well as Turkey. About this time, prince Engene now hastened out of Italy to command the army in Germany; and he met the duke of Madborough at Heilbron. The English general, being left intirely to his own judgment by his queen, as well as the Dutch, marched with fuccour into the heart of the Empire. He, at first, carried with him ten thousand English infantry, and twentythree squadrons of horse. He hastened his march, and arrived upon the banks of the Danube, near Donawert, opposite to the elector of Bavaria's lines, wherein about eight thousand French, and as many Bavarians, intrenched, guarded the country they had conquered. After a contest of two hours, Marlborough forced his way, at the head of three English battalions, and defeated the French and Bavarians. 'Tis said, that he killed six thousand of the enemy, and lost near that number himfelf : but the number of the dead is but of little consequence to a general, provided he gains his point. Marlborough took Donawert, passe the Danube, and laid all Bavaria under contribution.

Marshal de Villeroi, who attempted to follow the English general when he began his march, presently lost sight of him; and did not learn where the was, till he heard of the victory at Donawert. Marshal Tallard, at the head of thirty thousand men, marched another way to oppose Marlborough, and joined the elector.

18

nde

COL

not

proirely

rof

al de

the

and enna

and

offic.

their

ance,

Eu-

d the

Iarl-

eing

n, as

the

With

enty-

arch,

near

aria's

and

untry

ours,

three

and

usand

him-

ut of

gains

paffed

About the same time, prince Eugene arrived, and joined Marlborough. The two armies at last met near Donawert, and almost in the same plains where marshal Villars had gained a victory the year before. This general, who was then in the Cevennes, having received a letter from Tallard's army, dated the night before the battle, wherein the same in which Tallard intended to engage; Villars wrote to the president de Maisons, his brotheria-law, that if marshal Tallard gave battle in that position, he would certainly be deseated. This letter was shewn to Lewis XIV.

The French army, including the Bavarians, con-Med of eighty-two battalions, and an hundred and inty squadrons, which amounted to almost sixty bouland men; for the companies were not complete. The enemy had fixty-four battalions and an undred and fifty-two squadrons; but we may recon them only fifty-two thousand strong; for armies are generally given out to be more numerous han they really are. This bloody and decisive battle merits a particular attention. The French generals have been censured for many blunders; the principal of which was, the bringing their army under a necessity of fighting, instead of suffering he enemy to be consumed for want of forage, and giving marshal Villeroi time either to fall upon the aguarded Low Countries, or march into Germany.

N 4

But,

fouls

our b

T

mano

1000

expe

A

muc

princ

Subje

appl

1

Mar

rivu

the

the

obli

ifel

Th

Was

iou

hou

the 7

TOU

200

Cav

He

pol

dro

fire

qu:

100

W

But, in answer to this reproach, we must consider, that the French being more numerous than the confederate army, they had some reason to expect the victory; and, had they obtained this, the emperor must have been dethroned. The marquis de Feuquieres reckons up twelve capital faults committed before and after the battle, by Marsin, Tallard, and the elector: the most palpable was, the not placing a strong body of infantry in their centre and the separating their forces into two bodies. I have often heard marshal Villars say, that this distance in the series of the same say, that this distance in the same says that the sail polition was inexcufable.

Marshal Tallard was with the right wing, and the elector with Marsin, commanded the left. Tallard in his courage, had all the ardour and vivacity so peculiar to the French; his genius was lively, penetrating and abounding in expedients and resources. He was the person who had made the partition-treaties; in short, he had obtained glory and fortune by his capacity and courage. The battle of Spires had gained him immortal honour, not with standing all the censures of Feuquieres; for a victorious general is never guilty of any faults, in the publick opinion, in the same manner as one who has been deseated, is always supposed to have acted ill, though his conduct has been never so discreet.

Tallard had one misfortune extremely dangerous for a general: he was so short-sighted, that he could not distinguish objects at the distance of twenty paces. Those who have been well acquainted with him, have likewise assured me, that his ardent courage, quite contrary to that of Marlborough, was apt to be instanted, in the heat of action, to such a degree, as to deprive him of the perfect use of his understanding. This defect proceeded from the dry and hot temperature of his blood. It is sufficiently known, that all the qualities of our souls buls are derived from the natural constitution of our bodies.

The marshal de Marsin had never before commanded in chief; and, with a great deal of wit and good understanding, he was said to have rather the experience of a good officer than a general.

As for the elector of Bavaria, he was not so much considered as a general, as a courageous prince; amiable in his behaviour, beloved by his libjects, and one who had more magnanimity than application.

18

ler

on

the

ero

eu.

tte

ard

no tre

dif

and

Γal.

city

ely.

re-

the

lory

The

our

for

ults,

r as

d to

ever

rous

ould

enty

inted

rdent

ugh,

1, to

t ulc

from

It is

fouls

The battle began betwixt twelve and one o'clock. Marlborough, with his English, having passed a mulet, immediately charged Tallard's cavalry: the marshal, a little before, had passed over to the left wing, to observe its disposition. To be obliged to engage without their general, was, of itself, a great disadvantage to the marshal's army. The army, commanded by the elector and Marsin, was not yet attacked by prince Eugene. Marsborough had fallen upon the right wing almost an hour before Eugene could advance to the elector on the left.

When marshal Tallard was told, that Marlbobough had attacked his wing, he flew to it instantly, and found them in the heat of action: the French avalry were thrice rallied, and as often repulsed. He went to the village of Blenheim, where he had posted twenty-seven battalions, and twelve squadrons. This little separate army made a continual fre on that of Marlborough. From this village, where he gave his orders, he slew again to the other quarter, where Marlborough, with his horse and his foot between the squadrons, was driving before him the French cavalry.

M. de Feuquieres is certainly mistaken in saying, that murshal Tallard was not there; and that he was taken prisoner upon his return from Marsin's

N

wing

of t

felve

my,

them

and which

ral (

mar of r

nera

Dar

at th

he i

Pro

cor

me

the

fro

nec

and

vill

ear

abo

"

m

an

05

00

m

fit

tr

wing to his own. All the accounts agree, that he was present; and this he experienced to his cost; for there he was wounded, as was likewise his son mortally. All his cavalry was routed in his presence. The victorious Marlborough, on one side forced betwixt the two French armies; on the other his general officers advanced likewise betwixt Blenheim and Tallard's army, still separated from the little army in the village of Blenheim.

Marshal Tallard, in this distressed situation, hasten ed to rally some squadrons. The weakness of his fight made him mistake a squadron of the enemy for a French one; and he was taken prisoner b the Hessian troops, then in the pay of England At this very instant too, prince Eugene, after having been thrice repulsed, at last gained the advantage. Tallard's army was already completely routed, and put to flight. The confusion and distraction in this whole right wing was so great, that the officers, as well as foldiers, threw themfelves into the Danube, without confidering what they did. None of the general officers gave orders for a retreat; nor did any one think of faving or bringing to action, those twenty-seven battalions and twelve squadrons of the best troops of France, so unluckily cooped up in Blenheim. The mare shal de Marsin now made a retreat. Count de Bourg. afterwards a marshal of France, saved a small part of the infantry, by retiring through the marshes of Hochstet; but neither he, nor Marsin, nor any other, thought of those forces remaining in Blenheim, waiting for their orders: they amounted to eleven thousand men, and were all veteran troops. There are many instances of lesser armies, who have defeated others fifty thousand strong; or who have made glorious retreats: but the fituation of the place, where an army is posted, decides every thing. The French founds impossible to get out 18

he

oft :

for

pre

ide

her

len-

the

ten

his

emy

by

and

fter

ad.

tel

and

eat

em-

vhat

01-

ing

ions

nce,

nar

urg

part

fhes

any

len-

ops.

who

who n of

very

of

of the narrow streets of a village, to form themselves in order of battle, before a victorious enemy, which would instantly have over-powered them by a more extensive front, by its artillery, and even by the cannon of the vanquished army, which they had in their possession. Their general officer, the marquis de Clerambaut, son of marshal Clerambaut, hastened to demand orders of marshal Tallard: but when he found this general was taken prisoner, and saw all slying, he also took to slight, and ran to drown himself in the Danube.

Brigadier Sivieres, who was posted in the village at this juncture, made a bold and desperate effort: he called aloud to the officers of the Artois and Provence regiments to accompany him: thefe, acordingly with the officers of some other regiments, instantly followed him. They rushed upon the enemy in the same manner as a fally is made from a besieged town; but, after this sally, it was necessary for them again to retire into the village; and immediately after, an officer, named Desnontilles, entered the village on horseback, with the earl of Orkney: " Is this an English prisoner you "bring?" faid the rest of the officers, crouding bout him. "No, gentlemen," he replied, "I " am the prisoner; and come to tell you, that you "have no other course to take, but to surrender " yourselves prisoners of war; and here is my lord "Orkney, who offers you terms of capitulation." All these veterans expressed the utmost astonishment; the regiment of Navarre tore their colours, and buried them under-ground: but at last, being obliged to yield to necessity, they surrendered without fighting. My lord Orkney has himself assured me, that they could not do otherwise, in such a situation. All Europe was assonished, that the best troops of France should, in a body, submit to such

cible

ries,

defe

an i

fuch

any

hon

fine

Ble

the

hou

bot

we

bra

nu

by

2

CI

ch

51

an ignominy. Their misfortune was imputed to cowardice; but, some years after, sourteen thou. fand Swedes surrendering themselves prisoners at discretion to the Muscovites in the open field, this not a little justified the French.

Such was that celebrated battle, known in France by the name of Hochstet, of Plentheim in Germany, and, in England, by that of Blenheim. The conquerors lost near five thousand in the sield, and had eight thousand wounded; the greatest part in that wing commanded by prince Eugene. The French army was almost intirely destroyed; of sixty thousand men, who had been so long victorious, there remained not more than twenty thousand.

About twelve thouland of the French were killed, and fourteen thousand made prisoners: all their artillery, a vast number of their standards and colours, their tents and field-equipages, were likewife taken by the enemy, together with the general of the French army, and twelve hundred offi-Those who had fled, were cers of distinction. dispersed different ways: in less than a month, near three hundred miles of territory were loft. Bavaria being now subjected to the emperor, felt at once all the enraged rigour of the Austrian go. vernment, and the rapacious barbarity of a victorious soldiery. The elector in his flight to Brussels met with his brother the elector of Cologn, who was likewise driven from his dominions: they embraced each other, and shed tears. Amazement and consternation now seized the court of Versailles, hitherto accustomed to prosperity. The news of the defeat came amidst grand rejoicings for the birth of a great grandson of Lewis XIV. Nobody dared to tell the king so cruel a truth. Madame Maintenon was at last obliged to take upon her the office to inform his majesty, that he was no longer invincible. to

u-

his

Ce

-15

m.

ld.

art

he

of

to-

11-

il-

eir

00

(e-ie-

ffi-

ere

th,

felt

go-

els

ho

mind

hi-

of

rth

red

te-

fice

ole.

cible. It has been faid, and affirmed in most histories, that the emperor caused a monument of this defeat to be raised in the plains of Blenheim, with an inscription extremely satirical upon Lewis. But such a monument never existed: nor was there one any-where but in England, which was erected in honour of the duke of Matlborough. The queen and parliament built a spacious palace, in one of the finest parts of the kingdom, which has the name of Blenheim. This battle is there represented in the pictures, and tapestry. The thanks of both houses of parliament, with those of the cities and boroughs, and the acclamations of all England, were the first rewards of his victory. The celebrated poem of Mr. Addison, a more lasting monument than the palace of Blenheim, is accounted. by that learned and warlike nation, amongst the most honourable recompences bestowed on the duke of Marlborough. The emperor created him a prince of the Empire, and gave him the principality of Mindelheim, which was afterwards exchanged for another: but he has never been known by this title, the name of Marlborough having become the most illustrious he could have.

The French army being intirely dispersed, the ellies had now a free communication betwixt the Danube and the Rhine, which they accordingly passed, and entered Alsace. Prince Lewis of Baden, a general famous for encampments and marches, invested Landau. Joseph, king of the Romans, eldest son of the emperor Leopold, was present at the siege. Landau was taken, and likewise Traerbach b.

Tho' three hundred leagues of ground were lost, yet the frontiers of France still remained undiminished. Lewis XIV. Supported his grandson in November 19. and 23.

Spain, and was victorious in Italy. Great efforts were necessary to be made in Germany, to oppose the victorious Marlborough : and the utmost vigour was accordingly exerted. The broken remains of the army were reassembled, the garisons were drained, and the militia ordered to take the field. The minister borrowed money from all hands. An army was at last mustered up, and marshal Villars was recalled from the remotest part of the Geven. nes, to take upon him the command. Upon his arrival, he found himself near Treves, with an inferior force, opposite to the English general. Both were equally defirous to come to an engagement: but the prince of Baden not coming up in proper time to join the English troops, Villars had at least the honour to make the duke of Marlborough decamp : no inconsiderable thing at that time. The duke of Marlborough, who esteemed marshal Villars so much as to be desirous of his esteem. wrote to him, at decamping, in thefe terms: " Do " me the justice to believe, that my retreat is " owing to the prince of Baden; and that my efteem for you is greater than my perplexity on " his account."

The French had still barriers in Germany. Flanders, where marshal de Villeroi commanded, after being delivered from his confinement, was yet untouched. In Spain, Philip V. and the archduke Charles, equally expected to enjoy the crown: the former built his hopes on the power of his grandfather, and the favour of most of the Spaniards; the latter depended upon the affistance of the English, and the party he had in Catalonia and Arragon. This archduke, afterwards emperor, and then second son of the emperor Leopold, having nothing but his title, went to London, al-

F

ti

t

fi

y

th

C

nc

na

pr

in

cal

ou

fan

evi

its

an

tho

eig

most without attendants, to implore the assistance of queen Anne.

ts

ſe.

ır

of

re

d.

n

rs

n.

nis

in-

oth

t;

per east

me.

hal

em, Do

is

my

lan-

after

un-

duke

wn:

his

Spa-

e of

and

eror,

pold,

, al-

most

Then it was that the power of England fully displayed itself. This nation, so little interested in the quarrel, furnished the Austrian prince with two hundred transport-ships, thirty men of war, joined to ten Dutch vessels, nine thousand troops, and money, to conquer a kingdom. But, notwithstanding this superiority, arising from power and good offices, yet the emperor, in his letter to queen Anne, presented by the archduke, did not honour his benefactress with the title of majesty: he only gave her that of serene highness, according to the stile of the court of Vienna, which custom only can justify.

CHAPTER XIX.

The defeats in Spain; the defeats at Ramillies and Turin; and their confequences.

ONE of the first exploits of those English troops, was the taking of Gibraltar; which, not without reason, had been accounted impregnable. The place is rendered secure from any approach, on the land-side, by a long chain of steep inaccessible rocks. The entrance by sea is impracticable to large ships. The bay being long, dangerous, and stormy, ships are exposed to tempests, and the Canon of the fortress and mole. The citizens alone, in this place, might defend it against a thoufand ships, and an hundred thousand men. But even the strength of Gibraltar proved the cause of its being taken. The garifon confifted only of an hundred soldiers; and this number was sufficient: but they neglected a duty which they thought needless. The prince of Hesse had landed eighteen hundred soldiers on the isthmus, behind the

n

h

gr

re

fix

B.

ev.

21

he

the

Lo

Af

the

of

00

be

fro

mo

att

his

wit

Wit

him

whi

ente

but

the I

who

the northern side of the town: the steepness of the rock, however, made all attempts fruitless from that quarter. The fleet made fifteen thousand dif. charges of cannon; but all in vain. The failors, at last, in one of their merry moods, rowed with their long-boats under the mole; the artillery of which might have blown them to pieces, but not a fingle gun was fired. They scaled the mole, and made themselves masters of it: the soldiers hastened after them; this impregnable place was obliged to furrender a; and, to this day, remains in the poffession of the English. Spain, became again a formidable power, under the government of the prin. cess of Parma, the second queen of Philip V. and who has been so successful in Africa, as well as Italy, with an impotent indignation still beholds Gibraltar in the hand of a northern nation, whole ships, two hundred years before, durst hardly venture into the Mediterranean.

Immediately after the taking of Gibraltar, the English, now masters of that sea, engaged count Toulouse, the French admiral, in fight of Malaga. This fight, though not decisive, was the final period of the maritime power of Lewis XIV. Count Toulouse, his natural son, and lord high admiral of France, had, in this engagement, commanded fifty thips of the line, and twenty-four gallies. He retired with honour, and without Soon after, the king fent thirteen thips to attack Gibraltar, whilst marshal Tesse besieged it by land '; but this rash undertaking proved at once the ruin of the fleet and army. Part of the ships were cast away in a storm; part were boarded and taken by the English, after a very brave resistance; and part were burnt on the Spanish coast. From that day the French no longer August 4. 1704. August 26. 1704. March 1705.

9.

he

m

lif-

rs,

ith

of

ta

ind

ned

to

of-

or-

in-

and

as

lds

ofe

en-

the

unt

Ma-

the

IV.

igh

om-

four

out

nips

ged

ved

t of

vere

ery

panger

705.

1200

made a figure with their numerous fleets on the ocean, nor in the Mediterranean. The marine now funk again to that condition whence Lewis had raised it, in the same manner as many other grand things, which had their rise and fall during his reign.

The same English, who had taken Gibraltar, in same seeks conquered the kingdom of Valencia and Catalonia for the archduke Charles. They carried Barcelona by a mere chance, which proceeded from the rashness of the besiegers.

The English were at that time commanded by one of the most extraordinary menthat country, so fruitful in fierce, courageous, and peculiar geniules, ever produced. This was the earl of Peterborough; aman in every respect resembling those imaginary heroes, whom the Spaniards have represented in their romances. At fifteen years of age, he left London, to go to the war against the Moors in Africa. When he was twenty years old, he began the revolution in England, and became the first man of distinction in Holland, next to the prince of Orange: but, lest the design of his voyage should be suspected, he embarked for America, and sailed from thence to the Hague, in a Dutch veffel. He more than once gave away all his fortune. athat time, carried on the war in Spain almost at his own expence, and maintained the archduke, with his whole family. He besieged Barcelona, with the prince de * Darmstadt. He proposed to him, fword in hand to force the intrenchments, which covered fort Mont-joui, and the town. This interprize was accordingly executed with fuccess; but the prince of Darmstadt perished in the at-

^{*} In the history of Reboulet, this prince is called the head of the factious; as if he had been a Spaniard, who had revolted against Philip. V.

Ch.

ma

ner

fur

tur

fhi

T

andliff

an

cip

pr

eal

ab

Fr

fu

al

C

fic

ha

du

pr

A

ba

bu

ki A

2

pr

m

W

V

ta

th

W

tempt. A bomb happening to burst in the fort, blew up the magazine of powder, the fort was then taken, and the town offered to capitulate. The governor came to a parley with Peterbo. rough, at the gates of the town. The articles were not yet figned, when, on a sudden, there was heard a noise of shouts and huzzas: "You betray " us," faid the governor to Peterborough," while " we are capitulating with honour and fincerity: " behold your English have entered the town by " the ramparts; and are murdering, plundering, " and committing all manner of outrages." " You " are mistaken," replied Peterborough;" these must " be the troops of the prince of Darmstadt : there " is only one expedient to fave your town; allow " me to enter instantly with my English; I will " make all quiet, and then return to the gate to " finish the capitulation." He spoke this with an air of greatness and sincerity, which, joined to a fense of the present danger, influenced the governor; and Peterborough was accordingly admitted. He hastened, with some of his officers, into the streets, where he found the Germans and Catalans facking the houses of the principal inhabitants. He drove them away, and obliged them to quit the booty they were carrying off. He luckily rescued the duchess of Popoli out of the hands of the soldiers, by whom she was on the point of being dishonoured; and restored her to her husband. In short, after having quited all disturbances, he returned to the gate, and finished the terms of capi-The Spaniards were amazed at feeing fuch greatness of soul in the English, whom the generality had always looked upon as merciless barbarians, because they were heretics.

To the loss of Barcelona there was likewise added another m rtification, by an attempt to retake it, which miscarried. Philip V. though he had the majority

majority of Spain in his interest, yet had neither generals nor engineers, and but few foldiers. France furnished him all. The count de Toulouse returned, to block up the harbour with twenty-five hips, the remains of the French navy. Marshal Tesse formed the siege with thirty-one squadrons, and thirty-feven battalions. But as foon as the English fleet appeared, that of the French stood away, and marshal Tesse raised the siege in the utmost pre-He left in his camp, a vast quantity of cipitation. provisions, besides fisteen hundred wounded soldiers, who had nothing to trust to, but the humanity of the earl of Peterborough. These losses were considerable. It is doubtful whether it had before cost France more to conquer Spain, than it did now to The grandson of Lewis, however, support her. always maintained his right, by the affection of the Castilian nation, who persisted in their choice, and, from a principle of pride, continued in their fidelity: Things went on successfully enough in Italy. Lewis had sufficient revenge on the duke of Savoy. duke de Vendome had at first honourably repulsed prince Eugene at the battle of Cassano, near the Adda: a bloody action, and one of those undecisive battles, for which Te Deums are fung on both sides; but which only tend to the destruction of mankind, without advancing the interest of any party. After the battle of Cassano, Vendome gained a complete victory at Cassinato, in the absence of prince Eugene. The day after the battle, this prince arrived, and had the mortification to see a detachment of his troops intirely routed. The allies were at last obliged to quit the whole country to Vendome. There now only remained Turin to be taken, which was invested; and there appeared not the least possibility of its being succoured. wards Germany, marshal Villars drove before him the

ig.

was ate.

cles was

tray hilft

ty:

You

nust

low will

n an

o a

ted.

lans

He the

cued

foldif-

In re-

eing

gebar-

dded ke it,

the

V

cl

u

is

n

ti

d

fi

n

d

7

3

C

e

ſ

the prince of Baden. In Flanders, Villeroi com. manded an army of eighty thousand men: he was desirous to engage Marlborough, and highly flattered himself he should retrieve the honour he had lost in the battle with prince Eugene. His too great considence in himself, now proved more fatal than ever to France. Marshal Villeroi had encamped his army near the Mehaigne, towards the source of the Ghette. The centre was at Ramilles; a village which became as famous in history as Hochstet.

Villeroi had it in his power to avoid a battle; and all his general officers advised him to it: but he was hurri d away by a passionate desire of glory. The disposition he made for the engagement is said to have been such, that every experienced officer foresaw the satal consequences. The new-raised troops, undisciplined and uncomplete, were placed in the centre: he placed the b ggage betwixt the lines of his army; and posted his left wing behind a marsh, as if he intended to prevent its advancing to the enemy.

Marlborough perceived these oversights, and accordingly disposed his army so as to make the most advantage of them. He faw, that the left wing of the French army could not attack his right; he therefore immediately filed off a confiderable part of it, in order to advance to Ramillies with a superior number. M. de Gassion, the lieutenantgeneral, feeing this movement of the enemy, called aloud to the marshal: "You are undone, if you " do not instantly alter your order of battle: " draw off a detachment from your left, that you " may engage the enemy with an equal number: " make your lines closer: if you delay one mo-" ment, all will be irretrievable". Many other office s joined in this falutary advice. The marshal, however, remained inslexible. Marlborough began .

le.

ly

ne

is

re

ad

ds

a -

ry

;

ut

у.

is

ed

W-

re

xt

e.

d-

ic.

oft

ng

t;

ole

ith

nt-

led

rou

e:

uou

r:

10-

her

ar-

igh

gan

began the attack, his enemies being ranged in that very order of battle which he himself would have chosen, to secure his victory. This is the account univerfally given in France of this affair; and history is only a relation of the opinions of mankind. But may we not likewise affirm, that the confederate troops were better disciplined; and that the confidence in their commanders, as well as their late successes, inspired them with greater courage? Did not several of the French regiments fail in their duty? And are they not the firm and unmoveable battalions, which determine the fate of kingdoms? The French army did not withstand the shock half an hour. They fought almost eight hours at Hochstet, and killed near eight thousand of the conquerors; but, at this battle of Ramillies, they hardly destroyed two thousand five hundred of the enemy. The allies gained a complete victory: the French loft twenty thousand men, with the glory of their nation, and all hopes of retrieving it. The confederates had gained all Bavaria and Cologn by the battle of Hochstet; and, by this of Ramilies, they now got into their possession all the Spanish Flanders. The victorious Mariborough entered Antwerp and Brussels: he took Ostend, and Menin furrendered to him.

Marshal Villeroi was in the utmost despair: he had not courage to write to the king an account of the deseat; and remained five days without sending any express: at last, however, he wrote a confirmation of that news, which had before alarmed the court of Versailles. Nevertheless, when Villeroi again appeared before the king, this monarch, intend of reproaching him, only said, "Monsieur" le Marechal, the times are not favourable to us now."

The king immediately recalled the duke de Vendome from Italy, where he seemed no longer necessary,

tv

W

TO

fit

th

W

rag lib

de

his

Fe

ne

the

m(

gin

TIC

Va

ger

tor

of 001 tac

and

hab

rifi

fo t

ma

the

two

ceffary, to fend him into Flanders, in order, if possible, to repair the late misfortune. He hoped, at least, and with an appearance of reason, that the taking of Turin would afford some consolation for fo many losses. Prince Eugene was in such a situ. ation, that he could not advance to fuccour that city. He was on the other fide of the Adige; and as the river on this fide is fortified by a long chain of in. trenchments, the passage seemed therefore impracticable. This great city was befieged with forty-fix fquadrons, and an hundred battalions. The duke de Feuillade, who commanded, was one of the most shining and amiable characters in France; and, tho' a fon-in-law of the minister, was greatly in the public favour. He was fon to that marshal Feuil. lade, who erected a statue of Lewis XIV. in the Place de Victoires. He inherited all the courage of his father, with the same ambition, the same splen. dour, and a better understanding. He flattered himself, he should he able to take Turin; and, as a reward, he expected a marshal's staff. Chamillard, his father-in-law, who loved him tenderly, had spared nothing to succeed in the attempt. The very imagination must be startled at the detail of the preparations for this siege. The readers, who have not had an opportunity of being acquainted with fuch particulars, will, perhaps, not be displeased, if we here give some account of these vast and use. less preparations.

There were an hundred and forty pieces of cannon; each of which, with their carriages, amounted to two thousand crowns. They had also one hundred and ten thousand bullets, one hundred and six thousand cartouches of one fort, and three hundred thousand of another, twenty-one thousand bombs, twenty-seven thousand seven hundred grenades, sisteen thousand bags of earth, thirty thousand instruments for pioneering, and one million two hundred thousand pounds of powder. There was, besides, a vast quantity of lead, iron, tin, ropes, sulphur, saltpetre, with every thing requisite for miners, and, in short, all sorts of implements necessary to carry on a siege. 'Tis certain, that the expence of these preparations for destruction would have been sufficient to settle one of the most numerous colonies, and to have put it in a Hourishing condition.

e

70

1.

ne

1.

i.

IX

de

oft

0'

he

il-

he

of

n-

red

as

12-

ly,

he

of

vho

vith

sed,

ife-

an-

unt-

one

and

un-

fand

gre-

nou-

llion

two

The duke de Feuillade pushed this siege with the atmost precipitation, and contrary to all rules. He was a man of fire and activity, more capable than any one for such enterprizes as required only courage, but utterly incapable of those where art, deliberation, and time, were necessary. The marshal de Vauban, the only general, perhaps, who loved his country more than himself, had proposed to feuillade, to come and direct the fiege as an engineer, and to ferve in his army as a volunteer; but the haughtiness of Feuillade made him construe this offer of Vauban into pride under the disguise of modesty; and he could not bear, that the best engincer in Europe should presume to give him advice. He told him, in a letter which I have feen. "that he expected to take the town after the "method of Cohorn?" This Cohorn was the Vauban of the allies; an excellent engineer, a good general, and he had feveral times taken towns fortified by the rules of Vauban. After the fending of fuch a letter, Feuillade looked upon himself as obliged to take Turin. But having begun the attack by the citadel, which was the strongest side, and not having surrounded the whole town, the inhabitants could fend supplies both of men and prothions. The duke of Savoy could also march out: to that all the vehemence which Feuillade shewed in many repeated and fruitless assaults, only protracted the fiege. The

Ch

the

from

the

Bia

form

Bef

prin

to Tical

and

1 ken

Orle

oper force

sif

Po,

Rev

Carp

marc

of S

amp

with :

burfa

the

teet

alled

tal c

e du

nd th

id t

line

intr

our regi

ther

The duke of Savoy fallied out of the town with fome cavalry, in order to draw off the duke de Feuillade. The French general accordingly quitted the fiege to pursue this prince; who, being better acquainted with the country, easily escaped. Thus Feuillade missed the duke of Savoy, and the siege fuffered greatly.

All the inferior officers were so astonished at the proceedings of their general, that they believed he had no intention to take Turin. It was said, that Feuillade, who was reported to have a passion for the duchess of Burgundy, had sworn to that lady to favour her father's capital. This vulgar error became so prevalent, that I have hardly known one officer, but believed it, even twenty years after nay, it was likewise given out, that the duchess of Burgundy, in order to save Turin, had procured madame Maintenon to bring about those ill-conducted measures, which proved the safety of the city. These absurd reports gained credit; and many writers, to their dishonour, have inserted them in their histories.

The duke de Vendome, in order to favour the operations of the siege, remained stationed on the borders of the Adige, from the thirteenth of May to the twentieth of June. He had with him seventy battalions, and sixty squadrons; and, with this strength, he did not doubt he should be able to block up all passages against prince Eugene.

both of men and money. The mercers company of London lent him about fix millions of livres; and he at last got troops out of the circles of the Empire These reinforcements, however, arrived so late that all Italy might have been lost; but the sieg of Turin was much more tedious.

Vendom

h

le

ed

er

us ge

he

he

nat

for

to

be-

ond

er s of

rec

on-

the

ma

hem

r the

n th

ay to vent

thi

ole to

Vendome was already named to go to retrieve he losses in Flanders: but before his departure from Italy, he had allowed prince Eugene to pass he Adige; he fuffered him also to cross the canal Bianco, and at last the Po, a larger river, and, in ome parts, more difficult to pass, than the Rhone. before the French general left the banks of the Po, nince Eugene had it in his power to penetrate even Turin. Thus the affairs in Italy were in a criical fituation, whilft those in Flanders, Germany, and Spain, appeared quite desperate.

The duke de Vendome went to collect the broten remains of Villeroi's army; and the duke of Orleans, nephew to Lewis XIV. fet out to take pon him the command of the duke of Vendome's brees near the Po. These troops were in disorder. sif they had been routed. Eugene had passed the lo, in fight of Vendome: he crossed the Tanaro Rewise, in fight of the duke of Orleans, and took Carpi, Corregio, and Reggio; and having stole a parch upon the French, he at last joined the duke f Savoy near Asti. All that the duke of Orleans ould do, was to join the duke de Feuillade at the amp before Turin. Prince Eugene followed him with all expedition. They, had now one of two ourses to follow, either to wait for prince Eugene their lines of circumvallation, or march out to teet him near Veillane. The duke of Orleans aled a council of war, which confifted of the marwan al de Marsin, who had lost the battle of Hochster, mpan teduke de la Feuillade, Albergoti, Saint-Fremont. id the other lieutenant-generals: "Gentlemen," id the duke of Orleans, "if we remain in our s; an mpire o late lines, we shall certainly be defeated; for our intrenchments are fourteen miles in extent, and e sieg our numbers not sufficient to defend them. Our regiment of marines is only two men deep; and ndom there are many places, you see, almost without Vol. I. " defence.

1 t

ilit

M

ner

n it

af

om

mer

et e

is pi

dw

e, th

DS:

10 1

tren

con

t th

lifin

tent

Ly

Tanci

to a

m ain

tat,

"defence. The Doria, which runs through ou camp, will hinder our troops from bringing quick succour to each other. Besides, in wait ing for an attack, the French lose one of their greatest advantages; that vehemence, and those first moments of ardour, which so often deter mine the fate of battles. Believe me then, we ought to march against the enemy." All the lieutenant generals, with one voice, replied, "Le us march:" but upon this, the marshal de Marssin pulled out of his pocket, an order signed by the king, commanding all to submit to his opinion, it regard to an action; and he was for remaining it the lines.

The duke of Orleans now perceived, with indig nation, that he was sent to the army only as a princ of the blood, and not as a general; and, bein obliged to acquiesce with the marshal de Marsin, he prepared to engage in this disadvantageous situation

The enemy made a feint to form feveral attack at once. Their motions threw the French into great perplexity. The duke of Orleans was for one thing whilst Marsin and Feuillade were for another. The disputed, but came to no determination: but, if thort they suffered the enemy to pass the Doria which having done, they advanced in eight column twenty five men deep; and the French were no obliged to oppose them instantly with battalions an equal depth.

Albergoti, who was stationed at a distance from the army, upon the Capuchin mountain, had, undo his command, twenty thousand men; and he woopposed only by militia, who dared not to attachim. They sent to him to demand twelve thousand men. He answered, that he could not lessen him numbers; and gave some plausible reasons, which were taken. By this means, the time was lost in delays. Prince Eugene attacked their intrenchments

ing

ait

iei

of

ter w th

lar

th

, i

į i

dig

ind

ein

, h

tion

tack

t, 1

oni

ump

no

ons

e fro

und

ne W

atta

ft in de

nmen

d in two hours forced them d. The duke of Orans, having received a wound, was obliged to rete to have it dreffed. Scarce was he in the hands the furgeons, when he heard that the enemy were afters of the camp; and that all was loft. He was mediately obliged to fly: the lines and treaches are abandoned, and the whole army was dispersed.

Ithe baggage, provisions, ammunition, and the distary cheft, fell into the enemy's hands. Marshal Marlin, being wounded in the leg, was made priner: a furgeon, belonging to the duke of Savoy, titoff; but the marshal survived the operation ona few minutes. Mr. Methuen, then embaffador m England to the duke of Savoy, one of the most perous, bravest, and most sincere men his country memployed in an embassy, had always fought for sprince. He had seen marshal de Marsin taken, d was present at his last moments: and he has told that Marsin expressed himself to him in these m: " Believe, at least, Sir, that it was contrary to my advice, that we waited for you in our ingreat hing tenchments." These expressions seem positively contradict what had passed in the council of war; The they were certainly true: for the marshal de rin, at his departure from Versailles, had retent d to the king, that it would be absolutely neby to march against the enemy, if they should race to relieve Turin; but Chamillard, intimitd by the former defeats, carried it, that they tild not offer, but wait for battle; and this or er, at Versailles, caused the defeat of fixty thoumen. The French loft only two thousand ain this battle; but we have already seen, that ther does less execution than confusion. Want oula whitence, which will make a victor ous army Ten b tat, obliged these vanquished troops to retire to whit

[·] September 7. 1706.

en

20 th

G

ce

Wa

w

co

lep tha

ed

Joi Als

by

of]

kep

Bay

ken

out

Phil

Flar

MON

Bava

hve

toffe

Chai

conq

Lew

erro

hhis

Scot!

Grer

the go

Dauphiny. The late defeat occasioned such an universal disorder, that though the count de Medavy-grancey, then in Mantua with an army, had defeated the Imperialists at Castiglione, commanded by the landgrave of Hesse, afterwards king of Sweden, yet this victory, tho' a complete one, availed nothing. In a short time, they lost the duchies of Milan and Mantua, Piedmont, and at last the whole kingdom of Naples.

CHAPTER XX.

The consequences of the defeats received by France and Spain. The humiliation, perseverance, and resources of Lewis XIV. The battle of Malplaquet.

THE battle of Hochstet had cost Lewis one of the finest armies, with all the country betwixt the Danube and the Rhine: and it had con the to fe of Bavaria all her dominions. feat at Ramillies, all Flanders was loft, even to the gites of Lifle; and by that at Turin, the French were driven out of Italy, as they always had been in all the wars fince Charlemagne. There remained fome troops in Milan, and that little army which ha been victorious under the count de Medavy. The still kept some places; but these were offered to be given up to the emperor, on condition he allowed a free retreat to those troops, which amounted to fifteen thousand men. The emperor accepted this proposal, and the duke of Savoy also came into Thus the emperor, by a stroke of the pen, wa left in the peaceable poffession of Italy; and the conquest of Naples and Sicily was confirmed to him All those provinces in Italy, which had been confe dered before as only fee datory, were now treated entire entirely subject. He taxed Tuscany at an hundred and fifty thousand pistoles, and Mantua at forty thousand; nor were Parma, Modena, Lucca, and Genoa, notwithstanding their boasted liberty, excepted from these taxes.

0.

an

e-

ad

ed

re-

led

of

old

red

on.

V

ne of

be-

cost

e de

the.

ench

en in

ained

h had

The

to be

owe

ted 🚇

ted d

ne int

n, W

e con-

cont

ated

ntirely

The emperor, who enjoyed all these advantages, was not Leopold, the antient rival of Lewis XIV. who, under an appearance of moderation, had concealed the most profound ambition: It was his eldest son, the lively, fierce, and passionate Joleph; who nevertheless, was not a better warrior than his father. If ever any emperor feemed formed to enflave Germany and Italy, it was certainly loseph. His dominion now extended beyond the Alps. He laid the pope under contribution; and, by his fole authority, in 1706. he put the electors of Bavaria and Cologn under the ban of the empire: he stript them of all their possessions, and kept in confinement the children of the house of Bavaria, abolishing their very name. The father kemed now to have no other resource, but to linger out his diffrace in France, or the Low Countries. Philip V. afterwards gave up to him all the Spanish flanders, in 1712 *. If he could have kept this movince, which was a better establishment than Bavaria, it would have delivered him from the every of the house of Austria: but he could only roffels the towns of Luxembourg, Namur, and Charleroi; all the rest fell into the hands of the onquerors. Every thing now feemed to threaten Lewis XIV. who but a little before had struck a error into all Europe. The duke of Savoy had it this power to penetrate into France. England and extland, having formed an union, made now one kingdom;

 O_3

^{*} In Reboulet's history it is said, that he had this forereignty from the year 1700. but he had then only the government of it.

MC. of .

the 100

10 30

15

are

#t0

26

A

ops

E b

tac!

Th

112 (2)

fin

12 Phi

te

the 100

T'S

fort 127

7 1

Da.

Do:

kingdom; or, rather Scotland, being now a pro vince of England, was become an accession to the power of her antient rival. Towards the end the year 1706 and beginning of 1707. all the enemies of France seemed to have acquired ne strength, whill the appeared to be on the brink destruction; being pressed on all sides both by se and land. Of all those formidable fleets which Lewis had raifed, there remained scarce thirty.fre ships. In Germany, Strasbourg was still the from tier; but, Landau being lost, Alface was thereb left exposed. Provence was likewise threaten with an invalion by lea and land; and what the French had already loft in Flanders, made the more apprehensive for what remained. Yet, not withstanding all these misfortunes, France still remained untouched; and, in this unsuccessful way the had as yet lost nothing but her conquests.

Lewis XIV. every-where refuled; and tho' had received to many blows, yet he still opposed, protected, or attacked on all fides. His arm proved as unfuccefsful in Spain, as they had be in Italy, Germany, and Flanders. It is faid, the the siege of Barcelona was even worse conducted than that of Turin. The count de Toulouse only appeared with fleet, and was obliged to stand away for Toulon. Barcelona being succoured, the siege was abandoned; and the French army, after having loft of half of their number, retired, without any amms ni ion, into Navarre, a little kingdom which the preserved for the Spaniards, and which our king join as a title to that of France, by an antient cdtom, tho' it feems beneath their dignity.

To these misfortunes another was added, which feemed to complete them. The Portuguese, & tre filted by some English, took all the places they in the vested, and advanced into Estremadura. The प्रवाद

20

pro

th

id d

t

ne

k

y fe

rhid

-fre

fron

reby

tend

t the

the

no

ill re

W3

10'

ofed

arm

be

, the luci

ith 👪

TOT

were commanded by a Frenchman, created a peer of England: this was my lord Galloway, formerly the count de Ruvigni; whilst the troops of France and Spain were headed by the duke of Berwick, m English nobleman; but they could not stop the mogrefs of the conquerors.

Philip V. remained in Pampelona, uncertain of is destiny; whilft Charles, his competitor, was inrealing his party, and strength, in Catalonia.

He had made himself master of Arragon, the movince of Valencia, Carthagena, and part of Granda. The English kept Gibraltar in their own pos-Effion; and they took, for him, Minorca, Ivica, and Alcant. The roads to Madrid being now all laid men, Galloway entered that metropolis without er opposition, and ordered the archduke Charles to be proclaimed king: he fent likewise a small deachment to perform the same ceremony at Toledo. The affairs of Philip V. appeared fo desperate, that marshal Vauban, that prince of engineers, and exallent patriot, a man always busied in projects, ame ufeful, and others impracticable, but all extrordinary, advised the court of France to send Itilip V. to America, and to embark with him all the Spaniards attached to his interest. Spain must ten have been abandoned to civil factions; and the oulo ammerce of Mexico and Peru would have come andow wholly to the French: fo that, by this change of ft og intune in the family of Lewis, France might still amms have promoted her grandeur. The project was certhis the party deliberated upon at Verlames; but the king taken firmness of the Castilians, and the misconnected of the enemy, preserved the crown to Philip V. The people loved Philip as their own choice; which could they help having an affection for his the duke of Savoy's daughter, considering the, the duke of Savoy's daughter, considering the care she took to please them, the intrepidity she The displayed played above one of her fex, and the constancy and vigour with which she behaved in her missortunes. She went herself from town to town, animating the people, exciting their zeal, and receiving many presents which were brought to her. By this means, she furnished her husband with three hundred thousand crowns, in the space of three weeks. Not one of all the grandees, who had taken oaths of allegiance to Philip V. deserted him. When Galloway proclaimed the archduke at Madrid, many called out, "Long live Philip;" and the populace at Toledo were so enraged, that they attacked those who proclaimed the archduke, and obliged them to retire.

The Spaniards till then had done but little in support of their king; but when they faw him worsted. then, indeed, they exerted themselves in an extraordinary manner; shewing, on this occasion, a courage quite different from that of other nations, who generally begin with great efforts, and afterwards flacken. Now it appeared, how difficult it is to impose a king upon a people against their inclination. The Portuguese, English, and Austrians, in Spain, were haraffed every-where : they were in want of provisions, and made many false steps, such as are almost unavoidable in a strange country; so that, by degrees, they were intirely defeated. In short, Philip V. after having been three months an exile from Madrid a, entered again in triumph, and was received with as much joyful acclamation, as his rival had experienced coldness and reluctance.

Lewis XIV. redoubled his efforts, when he faw the Spaniards acting with fo much spirit: and tho' he was then obliged to guard all the coasts upon the ocean and Mediterranean, by placing the militia there; tho' he had an army in Flanders, another Ch

at S

Rou

Ber

that

tle o

the

mad

trao

6 it

" W

Orle

man

mad

took

rida,

0 inve

Som

hone

He

ide .

toot

in h

at la

give

tiers

Nap

en t

guera

nans

w,

FIS

ton.

of rec

N.pl

M

² September 22, 1706.

0.

су

-10

ning his

III-

KS.

ths

en

12-

u-ced

ged

Ip-

ed.

ra-

ou-

vho

rds

m-

on.

in.

t of

ard

nat.

ort,

xile

W2

his

faw

tho

the

litia

ther

att

at Strasbourg, a third in Navarre, and a fourth in Roufillon; yet he fent a reinforcement to Marshal Berwick in Castille.

'Twas with these troops, aided by the Spaniards, that Berwick gained the samous and important battle of Almanza over Galloway. Neither Ph lip nor the archduke were present at this action: and this made the samous earl of Peterborough, a min extraordinary in every thing, say aloud, "Excellent, "indeed! that we must fight for two princes, who "will not fight for themselves." The duke of Orleans, who intended to be there, being to command in Spain, did not arrive till next day; but he made all possible advantage from the victory: he mok several places; and, and, among the rest, Lerida, the rock the great Condé had split upon.

On the other fide, marshal Villars, who was again avested with the command, there being an absolute accessity for a man of his abilities, retrieved the honour lost at the battle of Hochstet, in Germany. He had forced the lines of Stolhoffen, on the other the of the Rhine, and dispersed all the enemy's toops b: he raised contributions on all the country a hundred and forty miles round, and penetrated a last as far as the Danube. This rapid success ave the French some respite on the German fronters; but all was lost in Italy. The kingdom of Naples, being defencelefs, and accustomed so ofen to change its masters, was reduced by the conperors. The pope was not able to prevent the Germins paffing through his territory; and he now w, without daring to complain, that the emperor is become his valial, greatly against his inclinaion. This is a remarkable instance of the influence received opinions, and the power of custom, that aples is always feized upon wi hout confulting the pore; and yet that the masters of the kingdom never refuse to pay homage for it to his holiness.

M / 11 1757.

At the very time when the grandson of Lewis XIV. lost Naples, his grandsather was on the point of losing Provence and Dauphiny. The duke of Savoy, and prince Eugene, had already entered by the narrow passage of Tenda. Lewis was greatly mortisted to see, that the duke of Savoy, who were before had been reduced almost to his capital, and prince Eugene, who had been educated in his court, were now likely to take from him Toulon and Marseilles.

Toulon was befieged with great vigour: an English fleet, having the command of the sea, lay be fore the port, and bombarded the town. Had the affailants used a little more diligence and precaution, and been more unanimous in their measures Toulon must have fallen into their hands. Marfeilles, being without any defence, could not have held out; and it was likely, that France would now lofe two provinces: but what feems likely, happens but feldom: There was time to fend fuccour: accordingly, a detachment was dispatched from marthal Villars's army to these provinces; for they chole to relinquish their advantages in Germany, to preferve a part of France. The country, through which the enemy penetrated, is dry, barren, and mountainous; provisions are scarce, and a retreat is extremely difficult. The fickness which prevailed in the enemy's army, proved likewise greatly in favour of Lewis. The fiege of Toulon was raifed e; and foon after, Provence was delivered, and Dauphing freed from all danger; for an invasion seldom sur ceeds, unless the invaders have a perfect knowledge in the country. Charles V. had miscarried in an attempt on the same provinces; and, in our time, the CI

qui

cef

1 alli

par

fore

Was

gre

Le

a de

dec

Fle

pro

to

but

glor

that

poli

ám áffi

Tou

thro

be r

and 11.

A

ben

114

cret their

div

and dipu

thou

c August 22. 1707.

m

Wis

oin

of

by

atl

0 tal

his

alon

ing

be.

the

cau-

ures.

Aar have

now

pens

20-

mar-

chole

pre vhich

OUE-

is ex-

ed in

TUOVE : and

gu 30

queen of Hungary's troops have also proved unfuccessful in an effort of the like nature.

Nevertheless, this irruption, so expensive to the allies, was no less so to the French: a considerable part of their territories had been ravaged, and their forces divided.

Europe did not expect, at a time when France was reduced fo low, and when the accounted it geat good fortune to have escaped an invasion, that Lewis would have the boldness or thrength to make descent upon Great Britain, notwithstanding the decay of his own navy, and the power of the British fleets, which covered the feas. This project was proposed by those of the Scots who were attached to king James's fon. The fuccess was doubtful; but Lewis XIV. thought he should acquire certain glory only by the attempt; and he himself said, that this motive determined him as much as any political interest.

To carry the war into Great Britain, tho' at the ame time, the burden of it was supported with great dificulties in so many other places; and to endeafour, at least, to re-establish James's son on the throne of Scotland, whilst Philip V. could hardly te maintained on that of Spain, seemed to be a bold and great undertaking; the success of which, after all, did not feem altogether improbable.

Amongst the Scots, all those who had not fold themselves to the court of London, repined at being as state of dependance on the English. Their semet wishes were unanimously for the descendant of phiny their antient kings, who, from his cradle, had been fue diven into exile from the thrones of England, Scotwledge and and Ireland, and even the legality of his birth an at- esputed. They promised, that he should find thirty the thousand men in arms, ready to fight in his cause, if the would only land near Edenburgh, with a small force from France.

Lewis

Lewis XIV. who, in his prosperity, had made so many efforts for the father, now exerted himself as much for the fon, even in his adverse fortune. Eight men of war, and seventy transports, were fitted out at Dunkirk; in which fix thousand troops were em-The count de Gace, afterwards marshal de Matignon, had the command of these forces; and the chevalier de Forbin Janson, a most excellent sea officer, was admiral of the fleet. juncture appeared very favourable: in Scotland there were not above three thousand regular troops and England was almost without any; all her soldiers being then employed in Flanders, under the duke of Marlborough: but they were embarked for England; and the English had then at sea a fleet of fifty men of war. This enterprize was just like that in 1744. in favour of a grandfon of James II It was defeated by activity of the English, and many cross accidents. The ministry at London had fufficient time to bring over twelve battalions from Flanders; and the most suspected persons in Edenburgh were seized. The pretender, at last, appeared on the coasts of Scotland; but the fignals agreed upon not being given, all that the chevalier de Forbin could nowdo, was to carry him back to Dunkirk. He faved the fleet; but no advantage was reaped from the expedition. Matignon was the only gainer by it; for, having opened his orders at fea, he found a patent for creating him a marshal of France: a reward for what he would have done, but could not effect.

If there ever was a chimerical notion, that was certainly one, conceived by some historians, who pretended, that queen Anne had a secret correla pondence with her brother. It is absurd, to the highest degree, to suppose, that she would invite her competitor to come and dethrone her. confounded the time; and it was thought that the favoured him, because she afterwards secretly con-

fidered

de

to

kin

Bu

ing

cro

wh

and

and

Ha

bra

he

hap

but

ma

of

aga Ve

it

off

pri

me

We

m

the

M

m

Fr

ex

an

ab

ta;

fo

th

the

thi

dered him as her heir. But who would ever wish to be dethroned by a fucceffor.

Co

28

u

n

a

s i

X-

he

nd

ps.

ol•

the ked

leet like

II

had

rom den-

ared

1000 ould

e ex-

for,

atent

d for t was

who

orrel-

o the

invite

They

at the y con-

idered

t.

The affairs of France now declining daily, the king resolved to send his grandson, the duke of Burgundy, to head the armies in Flanders; this ing, that the presence of the apparent heir to the crown would inspire the foldiery with emulation, which began to languish. This prince had a firm and intrepid foul: he was pious, just, philosophical, and seemed formed to command men of wisdom. Having been educated by the archbishop of Cambray, he had a strict regard to all the moral duties: he loved mankind, and was defirous to render them happy. He had been instructed in the art of war, but he looked upon it rather as the scourge of the human race, and an unhappy necessity, than as a fource of true glory. This philosophical prince was fent against the duke of Marlborough, and the duke de Vendome was given him as an affiftant: and here it happened, as it does but too often: the great officer was not heard with proper regard, and the prince's council often prevailed over all the arguments of the general. In the French army there were two parties; but that of the allies was unanimous in the common cause. Prince Eugene was then upon the Rhine; but, when he was with Marlborough, they were always unanimous in their meafures.

The duke of Burgundy was superior in numbers: France, though all Europe looked upon her as quite exhausted, had furnished him with an army of near an hundred thousand men, whilst the allies had only about eighty thousand. He had likewise the advantage of intelligence, in a country which had been so long under the Spanish Government, so tired of the Dutch garisons, and where the majority of the inhabitants were attached to Philip V. By this means, he easily got possession of Ghent and

Ypres.

th

U

to

P

pl

da

V

er

ta

H

hi

de

T

ha

to

70 un

03

DO

Da!

Bu

#h

W1

wa ed feci

Ypres. But the misconduct in the war rendered all these advantages fruitless. The division amongst the French perplexed all their councils of war. They first marched towards the Dendre, and, two hours after, they turned back towards the Schelde for Oudenard; and by this means, time was loft. Prince Eugene, and Marlborough, on the contrary, improved every moment to their ad. vantage, and always agreed in their measures. The French were routed near Oudenard d. It was not a great action; but it proved a fatal retreat. Many overlights were committed: the regiments, receiving no orders, escaped the best they could. There were above four thousand men taken in the roads by the enemy, a few miles only from the field of battle.

The dispirited army retired in disorder under Ghent, Tournay, and Ypres; and suffered Eugene, at his return from the Rhine, without any molestation, to besiege Liste with a less numerous force.

To besiege so large and so well fortisted a town as Lisse, without being master of Ghent, without having any other way for a convoy of provisions, or ammunition, but by Ostend, and these to be brought upon a narrow causway, liable to be surprised every moment, appeared to all Europe as a rash action; but the misunderstanding and perplexity, which prevailed in the French army, rendered it excusable; and the success at last justified the attempt. Their large convoys, so easy to be seized, escaped; and the troops, which escorted them, so likely to be deseated by superior numbers, came off victorious. The duke of Burgundy's army, which might so easily have attacked the enemy's impersect intrenchments, made not the least attempt upon them. In short, Lisse was taken, to the great astonishment of all Europe, who looked upon the duke of Burgundy as more able to besiege Eugene and Marlborough, than these generals were to invest Lisse. Marshal de Boussers defended the place for near four months.

4 July 11. 1708.

The inhabitants were so accustomed to the noise of cannon, and all the horrors of a siege, that public entertainments were exhibited, and as much frequented as in time of peace; and though, one day, a bomb fell very near the theatre, yet the diversion still went on uninterrupted.

Marshal Boussers was indefatigable, and had put every thing in such excellent order, that the inhabitants, confiding in his diligence, were intirely easy. His defence of this place merited even the esteem of his enemies, as well as the affections of those he desended, and the rewards of his royal master. The historians *, or rather the Dutch writers, who have affected to censure him, would have done well to consider, that, when they contradict the public voice, they ought to give the most strong and undoubted evidence for the truth of what they advance.

Mean while, the army, which had beheld the fiege of Lisle, gradually decreased: they allowed Ghent and Bruges to be taken, and all the other important posts one after another. Few campaigns had been more fatal. The officers, in the duke of Vendome's party, imputed their misfortunes to the duke of Burgundy's council; who, on their side, charged

t

ne

d

er

U-

ny

005

0.77

out

ns,

be ur-

25 2

per-

ren-

ified

orted bers,

ady's

least

^{*} Such is the history written by the Jesuit la Motte, who shed into Holland, under the name of la Hode: it was printed for a bookseller, named Vanduren; and was continued by la Martiniere; the whole being founded upon the pretended memoirs of a count defected any of state.

m

en

fli

ho

ha

he

tic.

ma

thu

00

thu

of

mi

wh

wa

chi

of

lih

hav

tim

the

thin

que

ther

the

all upon the duke de Vendome. All, in short, were excessively chagrined by the late disasters. One of the duke of Burgundy's courtiers faid to Vendome: See the consequence of your never going to mass; to this we must ascribe all our missor. "tunes." "Do you imagine," answered Ven. dome, " that Marlborough goes there oftener than " This rapid success of the allies not a little elated the heart of the emperor Joseph. He was already absolute in the Empire, and master of Landau; and he now faw the road to Paris almost in. tirely laid open, by the taking of Lisle. A party of the Dutch had the boldness even to force their way to Versailles by Courtray; and, under the very window of the castle, carried off the king's master of the horse, whom they mistook for the dauphin, the duke of Burgundy's father. A general consternation now seized Paris. At this juncture, the emperor had at least as great hopes of establishing his brother Charles in Spain, as Lewis had of maintaining his grandson on that throne.

The Spanish monarchy, which the people were fo zealous to prevent being dismembered, was already divided amongst three princes. The emperor had taken, for himself, Lombardy and the kingdom of Naples; his brother Charles still kept Catalonia, and part of Arragon. The emperor then forced pope Clement XI. to acknowledge the archduke king of Spain. This pope, who was faid to resemble St. Peter, because he first affirmed, thei denied, afterwards repented, and wept, had always acknowledged Philip V. after the example of his predecessor, and was attached to the Bourbon family. The emperor was now revenged on him, by annexing to the Empire several feudatory principalities, or duchies; particularly those of Parma and Placentia, which before had held of the popes: he likewise ravaged some of the ecclesiastical territories,

f

0

D

e

3

1-

ty

ir

ne

's

ne

enis

of

vis

ere

al-

ror

g.

Ca-

en

ch.

to

hel

ays

his

fa-

im,

rin-

rma pes:

erri-

ries,

tories, and feized the town of Commacchio. Formerly the pope would have excommunicated an emperor that dared to dispute any of his most trifling privileges; and this excommunication would have dethroned him: but the spiritual power of the holy fee being now reduced to fuch a degree as was reasonable, Clement XI. animated by France, had the courage, for a moment, to have recourse to the fword. He armed; but presently repented: he faw, that the Italians, being under an ecclesiaftical government, were not formed to handle the sword; he accordingly disarmed again, left Commacchio in the emperor's possession, and consented thus to address the archduke: "To our very dear " fon, the catholic king in Spain." The English feet in the Mediterranean, and the German troops on his frontiers, foon after obliged him to write thus: "To our very dear fon Charles king " of the Spanish dominions." This declaration of the pope, which availed nothing in the Empire, might have an influence with the people of Spain, who had been made to believe, that the archduke was un worthy to reign, because he was protected by those heretics who had seized upon Gibraltar.

There remained to the Spanish monarchy, beides the continent, the island of Sardinia, and that of Sicily: the former was conquered by an English fleet, and given to the emperor; for the English did not choose that the archduke should have any thing besides Spain. Their arms, at this time, made the treaties of partition. They deferred the conquest of Sicily to another opportunity; thinking it better to employ their ships in going in quest of the galleons from America, some of which they took, than to procure more dominions for the emperor.

France was now reduced as low as Rome, and in a more dangerous fituation; all her resources being now exhausted, and her credit intirely sunk: the people, who had idolized Lewis in his prosperity, now, in his missfortunes, murmured against him.

al

an

01

ar

bi

ty

th

fu

21

N

P

63

e

2

to 12

t

1

6

G

The persons, to whom the ministry had fold their country for some ready money on the most pressing emergencies, enriched themselves by the public misfortunes, and infulted the national calamities by their riotous luxury: what had been borrowed from them, was already confumed; and had it not been for the bold activity of some merchants, particularly those of St. Malo, who went to Peru, and brought from thence thirty millions of money, half of which they lent to the government, Lewis would not have had wherewith to pay The war had ruined the state, and the his troops. merchants retrieved it. The affairs of Spain were in the same situation. Those galleons which escaped the English, contributed to maintain Philip; but this supply for a few months did not remove the difficulty of raising recruits. Chamillard, who had the management of the finances, as well as the war, gave up the last to Mr. Voisin, afterwards chancellor, who had been governor of the frontiers: under him, however, the army was no better provided nor encouraged than before. Chamillard foon after f refigned the finances; but his successor Desmarets was not able to re-establish the f Feb. 1708.

^{*} The Jesuit la Motte's history, continued by la Martiniere, asserts that Chamillard was turned out of the ministry in 1703, and that marshal d'Harcourt was called to take upon him the management of the finances by the unanimous voice of the public. The mistakes of this historian are numberless.

public credit. The hard winter in 1709. was another aggravation to the desperate condition of The olives, which are the chief support of the fouthern parts of the kingdom, perished; almost all the other fruit-trees were likewise killed; and their hopes from harvest were intirely blasted. There were but few magazines; and any supply they could have from the fea-ports of the Levant, or Africa, must have been at the greatest expence, and very likely to be taken by the enemy's fleets; against which they had no naval force to oppose. This fevere winter prevailed through all Europe: but the enemies had more resources in this calamity. The Dutch especially, who had been so long the factors of different nations, had storehouses fufficient to supply the flourishing armies of the allies with plenty of all necessaries; whilst the broken and dispirited troops of France were ready to perish with want and mifery.

Lewis XIV. who had already made some advances towards a peace, being now in such distressed circumstances, resolved to send to the Hague his principal minister the marquis de Torci Cosbert, together with the president Rouille. This was extremely mortifying. They had first a conference at Antwerp with the two burgomasters, Buis and Vanderhussen, who spoke with the air of conquerors; treating the ministers of one of the most haughty monarchs with all that lostiness and contempt with which the Dutch had been treated in 1672.

The states general had no stadtholder since the death of king William; and the magistrates in Holland, who already assumed the title of patrician in their families, were now become so many princes. The four Dutch commissaries, deputed to the army, behaved in the most lordly manner to the thirty German princes in their pay. "Order Holstein

" to

ublic

0.

br

es

:

of-

fle

old

flo

he la-

en

ind

er-

ent

ons

rn-

pay

the

ere ef-

ip;

ove who

the

ards

on-

bet-

mil-

is *

the

by la

ut of

t Was

finan-

stakes

21 tre

pri

tin

his

an

vel

tw

W

T

du

tis

pro

Wi

Wi

of

Du

up

pre

Ch

the

tio

mu

the

aft

his

fe.

nec

[up

" to come hither," faid they: " Tell Heffe to " come and speak with us." This was the stile of those merchants; who in the plainness of their dress and diet, piqued themselves on humbling at once the German pride in their service, and the haughtiness of a monarch formerly their conqueror. By such proofs of their superiority, they did not mean to shew, that all grandeur consists in power: they defired to have the fovereignty of ten towns in Flanders; amongst which were Lisle, then in their possession, and Tournay, not yet taken. Thus the Dutch defigned to reap the fruit of the war, not only at the expence of France, but likewise of Austria, in whose interest they fought; after the example of Venice, who had formerly increased her territories from those of all her neighbours. The republican spirit is, indeed, at bottom, as ambitious as the monarchical.

This evidently appeared some months afterwards; for when this visionary negotiation was dropt; when the arms of the confederates had acquired greater advantages; the duke of Marlborough, more a fovereign in England than his royal mistress, having been effectually gained over by the Dutch, concluded a treaty with them in 1709. by this they were to be masters of all the frontier-towns to be taken from France; they were to keep garifons in twenty different places in Flanders, at the expence of the country, in Huy, Liege, and Bonne; and were to have upper Guelderland intirely under their They were, in effect, to become fovereignty. lords of the seventeen provinces of the Low Countries, and to have ruled in Liege and Cologn. Thus it was they intended to aggrandize themselves They had aleven on the ruins of their allies. ready projected these grand schemes, when the minister of France came to sue for peace, so that it is not

O

le

ir

at

ne

r.

an

ey

in

eir

us

ar,

of

he

fed

rs.

m-

ds;

pt;

red

gh,

ets,

ch,

hey

be

s in

ence

and

heir

ome

oun-

hus

elves

al-

miit is

not

not to be wondered at, he was received in so haughty a manner.

After having heard these mortifying preliminaries, the minister of Lewis XIV. proceeded to the Hague; where, in the name of his mafter, he was treated with the highest indignity. He there found orince Eugene, the duke of Marlborough, and the pensionary Heinsius, who were unanimous for coninuing the war. The prince, by this, purfued his glory and revenge; Marlborough fought glory, and an immense fortune, both which he equally coveted; Heinfius, being intirely ruled by the other two, looked upon himself as a Spartan common. wealthsman, who had humbled a Persian monarch. They did not propose a peace but a truce; and, during this suspension, they demanded an ample satisfaction for all their allies; and this was likewise promised to those of Lewis, on condition he joined with them to drive his grandfon out of Spain, within the space of two months; and, as a surety of this, that he should deliver up, for ever, to the Dutch ten towns in Flanders; that he should give up Strasbourg, Brisac, and intirely renounce all pretensions to Alface 8. Lewis little expected, when he refused prince Eugene a troop of dragoons, when Churchill was not even a colonel in England, and the name of Heinfius hardly known to him, that these three should ever prescribe him such conditions. The marquis de Torci departed without fo much as entering into negotiation, and reported to the king the orders of his enemies. Lewis now afted in a manner he had never before done with his subjects: he justified his conduct to them; and leat them a circular letter, wherein he set forth the necessity he lay under, of obliging them still to apport the burden of a war: wherein he also ex-

er

fie

ne

M

th

by

th

hu

co

Er

Pr

CO

the

ma

hur

abl

mis

cru

whi

trer

for

"

clot in a

in t

that

a W

part

Incu

Vera

tage

cited their indignation, their sense of honour, and even their pity. The politicians said, that Torci went, in a suppliant manner, to the Hague, for no other reason, but to shew the insolence of the eneraies, to justify Lewis to all Europe, and to animate the French with a spirit of just resentment: but the truth is, he went for no other end but to sollicit peace; nay, the president Rouille was left at the Hague, to try if he could procure easier terms: but, instead of giving any answer upon that head, the states commanded him to depart within twenty-four hours.

Lewis XIV. when informed of this mortifying behaviour, said to Rouille, since I must make war, " I choose rather to carry it on against my ene-" mies, than my children." He accordingly made all preparations for another effort in Flanders, The very famine, which depopulated the country, proved a resource in war; for those who wanted bread became foldiers. There were great quantities of land left untilled; but, however, an army was raised. Marshal Villars, who had been sent the preceding year to command the army in Savoy, where he raifed the spirits of the troops, and had gained some success, was now recalled into Flanders, as the most likely person to retrieve his sinking country. Marlborough had already taken Tournay, whilst Eugene covered the siege. And these two generals now marched to invest Mons. Marshal Villars advanced to oppose them: he had with him marshal Bousters, who, tho' his senior, had folicited to serve under him. Bousters sincerely loved his king and country: he proved, on this occasion, notwithstanding the maxim of a great wit, that, in a monarchical state, especially under a good master, there are virtues; and, doubtless, as many, and as great, as in republics, with less enthusiasm, nthusiasm, perhaps, but with more of what is er med honour.

As foon as the French advanced to prevent the fiege of Mons, the allies marched to attack them near the wood of Blangies, and the village of Malplaquet.

The two armies consisted each of about eighty thousand men; but that of the allies was superior by forty-two battalions. The French brought with them eighty pieces of cannon, and the allies an hundred and forty. The duke of Marlborough commanded the right wing, which consisted of the English and German troops in the pay of England. Prince Eugene was in the centre; and Tilli, with count Nassau, headed the left wing, composed of the Dutch troops.

e

.

d

y

nt

y,

ad

n-

k-

en

nd

ns.

nad

or,

ere-

this

reat

der ess,

less

Marshal Villars took upon himself the command of the left wing, and appointed Boussers to command the right. He had intrenched his army in a hurry; a precaution which seemed extremely suitable to an army, inserior in numbers, dispirited with missortunes, and one half composed of young recuits; and sui able to the circumstances of France, which a total defeat must reduce to the utmost extemity. Some historians have blamed the general for his disposition: "He ought," say they, "to have passed a large hollow, instead of having it in his front." But do not those, who, in their closets, pretend to pass a judgment on what passes in a field of battle, seem to be a little too consident in their own abilities?

All that I know is, that the marshal himself said, that the soldiers, who had gone without their bread a whole day, after having received it, threw away part of it, to advance to the engagement free of all incumbrance. There have been few battles, for several ages that continued longer, or were more tagerly contested, and none more bloody. I shall

fay

Cl

kir

ha

W

of

hi

th:

the

in

en

dif

00 fea

Mo

2/6

To

Le

ijer

affi

Co

trat faci to 6

fay nothing in regard to this action, but what was generally allowed. The left wing of the enemy, where the Dutch fought, was almost intirely destroyed, and even pursued with musquet and bayonet. Marlborough, on the right, made, and withstood, the greatest efforts. Marshal Villars drew off some part of his centre to oppose Marlborough; and, at that very juncture, the centre was attacked; the intrenchments, which covered it, were carried instantly; for the regiment of guards, left to defend them, made no resistance. The marshal, hastening from the left wing to his centre, was wounded, and the battle lost. The field was covered with near thirty thousand men, either dead or expiring.

There was nothing to be feen but one continued heap of carcases, especially where the Dutch had been stationed. The French lost about eight thousand men in this battle, whilst the enemy had about twenty-one thousand killed or wounded; for the centre having been forced, and the two wings broke through, the vanquished had made the greatest flaughter.

Marthal Bouflers * made a retreat in good order; being affifted by the prince de Tingri-Montmorenci, afterwards marthal Luxembourg; who inherited all the courage of his ancestors. The army retired between Quenoi and Valenciennes, carrying with them several colours and standards taken from the enemy. These spoils afforded some consolation to Lewis XIV. and the honour of having sought so considerable a time, and having lost only the field of battle, was accounted equal to a victory. Marthal Villars, at his return to court, assured the king, that had he not been wounded, he should have gained the victory. I have been in company with the marshal, who always seemed persuaded of this; but I have met with hardly any person of his opinion.

^{*} In a book. intitled, Memoires du marechal de Barwick, it is said, that marshal Barwick made this retreat. Thus it is that most memoirs are written.

It may feem fomewhat aftonishing, that an army. which had killed of the enemy two thirds more than they had loft, should not endeavour to hinder those who had no other advantage than that of lying amidst their dead, from going to besiege Mons. The Dutch shewed great apprehensions about this enterprize; and not a little hesitated: but the name of a battle lost imposes upon the conquered, and dispirits them. Men never do all they have in their power; and the foldier, when told that he is defeated, is afraid of meeting with the like fate again. Mons was therefore belieged and taken : and it allo was given up to the Dutch; as were likewise Tournay and Lisle.

CHAPTER XXI.

Lewis XIV. continues to fue for peace, and to act on the defensive. The duke de Vendome secures the king of Spain on his throne.

THE enemy thus made a gradual progress; I they not only took, on this side, all the barliers of France, but they likewise intended, by the afistance of the duke of Savoy, to invade Franche-Compté, and, by the two extremities, to penetrate into the heart of the kingdom. In order to acilitate this enterprize, general Merci was ordered nenter the higher Alface, by Bale; but he was h October 11. 1709.

king Vol. I.

luckily

treat.

Bar-

0:

as y,

e-

et. d,

ne

d,

he

n-

nd

n. id-

red

·X·

ued

nad

oua-

for ngs

eat-

der;

nci,

rited

reving

rom

solalving

only

tory. d the luckily obstructed by count du Bourg, near the ille of Newbourg on the Rhine *. Those of the name of Merci, by I know not what fatality, have been always as remarkable for their misfortunes, as their reputation. This we have just mentioned, was intirely defeated. Nothing was attempted on the side of Savoy; but the French were nevertheless in great apprehensions from Flanders; and the inner parts of the kingdom were in fuch a declining state, that Lewis still sued for peace in a suppliant manner. He offered to acknowledge the archduke as king of Spain; to give no affiftance to his grandfon, but to leave him intirely to his own fortune; to give four cautionary towns; to deliver up Straf. bourg and Brifac; to renounce the fovereignty of Alface, and only to keep the government there. of; to demolish all the forts betwixt Bale and Philipsbourg; to fill up the harbour of Dunkirk. and intirely erafe the fortifications of that place. which had been formidable for so considerable a time; to give up to the states general Lisle, Tournay, Ypres, Menin, Furnes, Conce, and Mau-These were, in part, the articles upon which it was proposed to conclude the peace which he implored.

The allies, by way of triumph, pretended they wanted to examine more narrowly into the fubmilfions of Lewis XIV. They allowed his plenipoten. tiaries to come, the beginning of 1710. to the little village of Gertrudenberg, with the petitions of that and s monarch. For this purpose, he made choice of the marshal d'Uxelles, a man of a cool and reserved temper, and though not of a bold and enterprising omn turn, yet extremely discreet in his conduct; toge- mier, ther with the abbot, afterwards cardinal de Polignad luger a man of the finest genius, and one of the greatest mer t

Ch.

ora

gra

eloc

hov

prin

mal

con

Th

they

duk

baff:

awa

fulte

pole

er e

Mar

T

far a

non

lifen

imin

dive

a tv

nore

rofe

W

mann

IIV.

hey a

· Alr

mm

² August 26, 1709.

e

at 9

f.

of ·9

nd rk.

ce, e a ur-

au-

pon ich

hey

rators

orators of his age; made at once to please by the gracefulness of his person, and the force of his doquence. Neither wildom, eloquence, nor wit, however, avail any thing in ministers, when the orince is unsuccessful. Victories are the best peacemakers. The embassadors of Lewis were rather confined at Gertrudenburg, than admitted to treaty. The deputies came to hear their proposals, which hey carried to the Hague to prince Eugene, the duke of Marlborough, and count Zenzindorf, emballador from the emperor. These offers were aways received with contempt. They were infilted by scurrilous libels; all of which were compoled by French refugees, who were become greata enemies to the glory of Lewis XIV. than Marlborough or Eugene.

The French plenipotentiaries even submitted so ar as to promife, that the king should contribute money to dethrone Philip V. and yet they were not Mened to. The allies infifted, as one of the prelminaries, that Lewis should engage, by himself, to dive his grandson out of Spain, by force of arms, a two months. This abfurd inhumanity, much nore insolent than a downright refusal of peace, while from new successes.

Whilft the confederates treated in this haughty mil- miner, in opposition to the grandeur of Lewis den. AlV. they took the town of Douay: soon after, little dey also made themselves masters of Bethune, Aire, that and Saint-Venant. The earl of Stair even propos-

Almost at the same time, the archduke's army, rising ammanded by Gui de Staremberg, the German toge meral, who had the greatest reputation after prince gnad lagene, gained a complete victory, near Saragoffab, eated her the army in which Philip placed all his hopes, mmanded by the marquis de Bay, an unfortunate

[·] August 20. 1710.

general. It was again remarked, that neither of the two princes, who disputed the crown of Spain, tho' both within the reach of the army, was present at the battle. Of all the princes who were fought for by the other powers of Europe, the duke of Savoy was the only one who ferved in person. It was hard, however, that he could not acquire this glory, but by fighting against his two daughters; one of whom he wanted to dethrone, in order to gain a small part in Lombardy, about which the emperor Joseph had already raifed difficulties, and of which he would certainly be deprived the first opportunity.

This emperor was every-where fuccefsful, and every where shewed great want of moderation in his By his own authority alone, he difprosperity. membred Bavaria, and gave away the jurisdictions thereof to his relations and creatures. He stript the young duke of Mirandola of his dominions in Italy. The princes of the Empire furnished him with an army on the Rhine; not confidering, they contributed to strengthen a power they dreaded: fo much did the antient hatred against Lewis XIV. still prevail in their minds, that the humbling of that monarch seemed their first care, Joseph had likewis the good fortune to overcome the malecontents in Hungary. France had flirred up against him the prince Ragotski, who took arms in defence of his own rights, and those of his country. Ragotski being defeated, his towns were taken, and all his Thus Lewis XIV. was equally unparty ruined. fortunate abroad as at home, by sea as by land, and in his public negotiations, as well as private intrigues.

All Europe now imagined, that the archduk Charles, brother to the fortunate Joseph, would reign in Spain without any rival; but Europe was threatened with a power more formidable than that of Charles V. This was England who had been,

for

Ch

for

fri

had

fam

quit

the

triu

lon

ener

don

fron

with

War

whe

rigo

Fran

mie:

uga

Was

dom

than

of th

the

hen

non

non

totte

ofte:

deco

with

he a

Casti

party

obstin

petito

10 1

for a considerable time, jealous of the Spanish-Aufrian branch, and Holland, its revolted flave, who had almost exhausted herself to establish the Austrian family. Philip V. who had returned to Madrid, quitted it again, and retired to Valadolid, whilst the archduke made his entry into the capital intriumph.

e

e

y

as

d,

ut

m

art

ad

uld

ind

his

dif

ons

the

aly.

an

tri

uch

pre-

mo-

wie

ts in

the

f his

otiki

his

un-

, and

e in-

duk

been, for

The French king could no longer affift his grandfon; he had been obliged to do in part what his memies had demanded at Gertrudenburg; to abandon the cause of Philip, by ordering his troops from Spain for his own defence: for he could not, without the utmost difficulty, defend himself towards Savoy, the Rhine, and especially in Flanders, where the war was carried on with the greatest ngour.

Spain was in a still more distressed condition than france: all her provinces had been ravaged by enemies, or protectors. She had been invaded by Porngal, and all her commerce was destroyed. There was likewise a general scarcity thoughout the kingom; but this proved more fatal to the conquerors han the conquered, because, in a considerable part of the country, the people refused every thing to the Austrians, whilst their affections prompted hem to do all in their power for Philip. monarch had now neither troops, nor a general, from France. The duke of Orleans, by whom his attering condition had been somewhat recovered, aftead of continuing to command his armies, was become his enemy. It is certain, indeed, that, notwithstanding the affection of Madrid for Philip, and the attachment of great part of the nobles, and all Castille, to his cause, yet he had still a formidable Party against him. All the Catalans, a warlike and blinate people, were strongly attached to his comvould e was letitor; and the half of Arragon was likewise gaind over to the same interest. One party of the n that P 3 people

21

d

th

m

g

to

di

ly

in

the

la

ful

the 25

me

2116

ties

feiz

ma

tog

eve

not

que ob!

foll

hop

lifh,

very

Phil

his

Ven

and people waited the event; another hated the arch-duke more than they loved Philip. The duke of Orleans, of the same name with Philip, distaissied with the Spanish ministry, and more so with the princess des Ursins, who chiefly governed, began now to entertain some hopes, that he might be able to procure for himself the kingdom he had been defending: accordingly, when Lewis had proposed to abandon his grandson, and an abdication was talked of in Spain, the duke of Orleans thought himself worthy to fill the throne, which Philip seemed about to renounce. He had pretensions to the crown of Spain, which the testament of the deceased king had neglected; but his father had kept up his rights by entering a protest.

By his agents he made a private league with some of the Spanish nobles, whereby they engaged to place him on the throne, if Philip should abdicate In this case he would certainly have found many of the Spaniards ready to inlift under the banners of fo warlike a prince. Had this project succeeded, it could not have displeased the maritime powers who would then have had less occasion to be afraid of feeing France and Spain united under the fame prince; and it would likewise have removed some obstacles to the peace. The scheme was discovered at Madrid, about the beginning of 1709. when the duke of Orleans was at Versailles, and his a gents in Spain were immediately imprisoned. Philip could not forgive his relation for imagining that he would abdicate, and for having formed a defige to fucceed him. France likewise exclaimed again him; and the dauphin, father to Philip V. gave it as his opinion in council, that he ought to be proceeded against as guilty of high treason: but the king chose rather to bury in silence this unformed and excusable project, than to punish his nepher

1.

of

ed

he

an

ole

le-

fed

vas

ght

ilip

to

the

had

ome

to

ate.

y of

ded

vers.

fraid

fame

fome

vered

when

113 3

Philip

g that lefigo

gain! ave it

pro-

ormed

phev

at a time when his grandfon was on the brink of destruction.

At last, about the time the battle of Saragossa was fought, the king of Spain's council, and most of the nobles, being sensible they had no able commander to oppose against Staremberg, who was regarded as another Eugene, they wrote in a body to Lewis XIV. intreating he would send them the duke of Vendome.

This prince, who had retired to Anet, accordingly departed. His presence was equal to an army. The great reputation he had acquired in Italy, not impaired by his unfortunate campaign at Lisle, fruck the Spaniards with admiration. His populaity, his liberality, which even extended to profusion, his openness of temper, and his love for the foldiery, gained him universal esteem. As soon as he fet foot in Spain, it happened to him as formerly to Bertrand du Guesclin; his name alone drew numbers of volunteers. He wanted money; and this he was supplied with by the boroughs, cities, and religious houses. The whole nation was feized with a spirit of enthusiasm. The broken remains of the battle of Saragossa were again brought together, and united under him at Valadolid; and every part of Spain was eager to furnish him with recruits. The duke de Vendome, being resolved not to fuffer this ardour to cool, pursued the conquerors, brought back the king to Madrid, and obliged the enemy to retire to Portugal. He fill followed them, forded the Tagus, took Stanhope prisoner at Brihuega, with five thousand Englift, came up with general Staremberg, and the very next day gave him battle at Villaviciosa. Philip V. who had never yet fought in person with his other generals, being animated by the spirit of Vendome, put himself at the head of the right wing, and the general commanded the left. Here they gained so complete a victory, that, in the space of four months, this prince, who, at his arrival, found every thing in the most desperate situation, restored perfect quiet, and settled for ever the crown of Spain on Philip.

Whilst this great revolution assonished the allies, another less distinguished, though not less decifive, was forming in England, Sarah Jennings, duchess of Marlborough, intirely ruled queen Anne, and the duke governed the nation. He had the treafury at his comminand, by means of Godolphin the lord high treasurer, father-in-law, to one of his daughters: he wholly influenced the council by means of Sunderland, his fon-in-law, fecretary of state; and the queen's houshold, where his wife presided, was at his devotion. He was absolute master of the army, all the posts in it being in his disposal. The Whigs and Tories were the two parties which then divided England; the former, of which Marlborough was the head, refused nothing to promote his grandeur; and the latter were forced to admire him, and be filent. It may not be unworthy of history to take notice, that the duke and duchess were the most graceful persons of their time; and that this outward advantage not a little attracts the multitude, especially when joined to honour and glory.

He had even more interest at the Hague than the grand pensionary; and his influence in Germany was considerable, being always as successful a negotiator as a general; no private person had ever so extensive a power, or so high a glory. He might also strengthen his power by that immense wealth which he acquired in his command. I have heard it said by his widow, that, after sour children had their patrimonies, there remained, exclusive of any court savour, a yearly income of seventy thousand pounds, equal to about one million sive hundred thousand

th

m

fo

to

co

of

his

hu

gre

In

the

rer

que

and

du

glo

que

car

lad

Eu

ly

rite

refi

To

from

Ma

to

the

the

tion

maj

eac

013 way

this

peri

-

n

f

y

of

fe

te

is

O

er,

0-

re

ot

he

ns

tor

in-

the

iny

never

He

nfe

ave

ren

e of

ou-

red

and

thousand livres French money. Had not his parsimony been equal to his grandeur, he might have formed a party the queen would have been unable to destroy: and if his duchess had had a little more condescension, the queen would never have shaken off her fetters. But the duke could not overcome his passion for riches, nor the duchess give up her The queen had loved her to fuch a degree, as to be under a perfect subjection to her will. In such connexions disgust generally proceeds from the person who has the greatest ascendant. Caprice, haughtiness, and an abuse of this superiority, often render the yoke intolerable, and the duchels of Marlborough carried them to the highest degree. The queen began to look about for another favourite, and turned her eyes upon lady Masham. duchefs was now roused with jealousy. gloves of a particular make, which she refused the queen, and a bason of water she, with affected carelessines, in her majesty's presence, let fall on lady Masham's gown, gave a turn to the affairs of Europe. The queen and duchess became now highly incensed against each other. The new favourite's brother solicited the duke for a regiment: he refused this request, and the queen granted it. The Tories seized this opportunity to deliver the queen from her domestic slavery; to humble the power of Marlborough; to make a change in the ministry; to conclude a peace: and, if possible, to restore the Stuart family to the throne of England, the duchess been a little more pliant in her disposition, she might have regained her influence. Her majesty, and she, had been accustomed to write to each other under fictitious names. This mysterious and familiar correspondence left a channel always open for reconciliation; but the duchess used this only to widen the breach. She wrote in an imperious manner, saying, in her letter, " Do me " justice " justice, and give me no answer." She afterwards repented, and, in tears, came to ask pardon. The queen made her no other reply than this: "You have ordered me to give you no answer, and I will obey." The rupture being now irrepa. rable, the duchess appeared no more at court. Some time after, they began with turning Sunderland out of the ministry, in order next to displace Godolphin, and then the duke himself. In other kingdoms, this is termed a difgrace; but, in England, 'tis a change in affairs. This, however, was extremely difficult to bring about. The Tories, though masters of the queen, were not so of the kingdom. They were obliged to have recourse to religion; of which they have no more at present in Great Britain than what is necessary to distinguish parties. The Whigs inclined to presbyterianism: this was the party which had dethroned James II. persecuted Charles II. and beheaded his father. The Tories were for episcopacy; which favoured the house of Stuart, and wanted to establish the doctrine of pasfive obedience towards kings, the bishops expecting thereby to procure a greater submission to themfelves. They spirited a preacher to enforce this doctrine in the cathedral of St. Paul's, to paint the administration of Marlborough in the most odious colours, and to blacken the whole party, which had fixed the crown on king William. But the queen, though the favoured this priest, had not a sufficient power to hinder his sermon being publicly burnt, and himfelf filenced for three years by both houses of parliament. The queen was still more sensible of her weakness, when she found that, notwithstanding her secret affection for her own blood, she durst not open the passage to the throne, thut against her brother by the Whigs. Those writers, who say, that Marlborough, and his party, fell as foon as the queen withdrew her favour,

П

D

L

L

U

m

ex

lio

fo

de

m:

th

02

Wa

.

d

.

le

ut

n, s,

a

ly

gh

m.

n;

eat

es.

was

ted

ries e of

paf-

ting

emthis

paint

molt

arty.

But

d not

pub-

vears,

ound,

r her

to the

Vhigs.

w her

avour,

favour, seem not to be acquainted with the constitution of England. The queen, though strongly inclined to a peace, dared not even to remove Marlborough from the command; and in the spring of 1711. he still continued to harass France, notwithstanding his disgrace at court. Proposals of peace from France were secretly offered at London; but the queen's new ministry durst not yet accept of them.

A new event, as unexpected as many others, effected this grand work. This was the death of the emperor Joseph •, who left all the dominions of the Austrian family, the empire of Germany, and his pretensions on Spain and America, to his brother Charles, who was elected emperor of the Romans a few months after.

As foon as the emperor's death was known, those prejudices which had armed fo many nations, began now to be diffipated in England, by means of the new ministry. Great pains had been taken to hinder Lewis XIV. from governing Spain, America, Lombardy, the kingdom of Naples and Sicily, under the name of his grandson; and why should they now wish to see so many dominions united in the house of Austria? Why should the English nation exhaust their treasures? They contributed more than Holland and Germany together; and the expence of the present year amounted to seven millions sterling. Must Great Britain ruin herself in to foreign a cause, and to procure a part of Flanders for the United Provinces, her rivals in commerce? These considerations, which emboldened the queen, opened the eyes of great part of the nation; and a new parliament being called, she was now at liberty to make preparations for the peace of Europe.

April 17.1711.

But though she was secretly endeavouring to bring it about, the could not yet publicly difengage herself from her allies; and whilst private negotiations for a peace were transacting in the cabinet. Marlborough was carrying on hostilities in the field. He made continual advances in Flanders, and forced the lines which marshal Villars had drawn from Montreuil to Valenciennes: he took Bouchain, and advanced as far as Quesnoi 4; from whence to Paris there was hardly a fingle fort to oppose him.

It was at this unfortunate time, that the famous Dugué trouin, by his courage, and the affistance of some merchants, having no rank in the navy, and owing every thing to himself, equipt a fleet, and took St. Sebastian de Rio Janeiro e, one of the principal towns in Brasil. He returned loaded with riches; but the Portuguese lost more than he gained. All this damage, however, done at Brafil, proved no remedy to the misfortunes of France.

CHAPTER XXII.

The victory gained at Denain by marshal Villars. The affairs of France retrieved. A general peace concluded.

HE negotiations for a peace were now publicly entered upon at London. The queen fent the earl of Strafford embassador to Holland, to lay before the states the proposals of Lewis XIV. It was not Marlborough they had now to folicit; for Strafford obliged the Dutch to name plenipotentiaries, and to receive those of France.

September 1711. September, and October 1711. There

S

5

,

t,

of

he

a-

e.

al

d.

ub-

een

to

IV.

cit;

ten-

1.

here

There were three eminent men who still opposed this peace. Marlborough, prince Eugene, and Heinsius, persisted in their resolution to distress Lewis XIV. But the English general, upon his return to London, towards the end of 1711. was divested of all his employments. He found a new house of commons; nor had he now a majority amongst the lords; for the queen, having created feveral peers, had thereby weakened the duke's party, and made an accession to that of the crown. Like Scipio, he was accused of misdemeanours; but he extricated himself, like him, by his glory, and by retiring. However, he was still powerful in his disgrace. Prince Eugene scrupled not to come over to London, to affift his party. prince met with fuch a reception as his rank and distinguished merit deserved; and the refusal due to his propositions. The court prevailed: prince Eugene returned alone to finish the war; and, having no companion to share the honour, this was a fresh incitement to him, to hope for new victories.

Whilst the conferences were carrying on at Utrecht, where the French ministers, who had been fo haughtily treated at Gertrudenburg, came now to negotiate on more equal terms; marshal Villars, having retired behind his lines, covered Arras and Cambray. Prince Eugene took the town of Quefnoy, and extended in the country an army of about an hundred thousand men. The Dutch had made an extraordinary effort; and though hitherto they had not borne the expence they had agreed to in the war, yet this year they even furnished beyond their contingent. Queen Anne could not yet openly difengage herself. She had sent the duke of Ormond, with twelve thousand English, to prince Eugene's army, and still retained in her pay a considerable body of Germans. Prince Eugene, having burnt the suburbs of Arras, marched against the French army, and proposed to the duke of Ormond to give battle: but the English general had been fent thither with orders not to fight. Mean while, the particular negotiations of France and England ad. vanced, and a suspension of arms was proclaimed betwixt the two crowns. Lewis XIV. put Dun. kirk into the hands of the English, as a surety that he would perform his engagements. The duke of Ormond retired towards Ghent: he carried with him all the English troops, and wanted likewise to have drawn off those in his mistress's pay; but he could only procure twelve fquadrons of Holstein, and a regiment of Liege, to follow him. The troops of Brandenbourg, the Palatinate, Saxony, Heffe, and Denmark, still remained under prince Eugene, and were paid by the Dutch. Even the elector of Hanover, who was to succeed queen Anne, left his troops with the allies; shewing thereby, that, though his family expected the crown of England, they did not build their hopes on any favour from the queen.

army

Prince Eugene, though deprived of the English, was still superior to the French army by twenty thousand men: he was so too by his situation, by his plenty of every thing, and by a course of victories for nine years.

Marshal Villars could not hinder him from befleging Landrecy. France, being drained of men and money, was in the utmost consternation; nor could the French depend greatly on the conferences at Utrecht, fince the fuccess of prince Eugene might render them all ineffectual. Considerable detachments of the enemy had already ravaged part of Champagne, and penetrated even to the gates of Rheims.

There was now a general alarm in Versailles, and throughout the whole kingdom. About a year afterwards happened the death of the king's only fon:

fon: the duke and duchess of Burgundy, with their eldest son, being taken off suddenly in a few months after, were carried to their graves in the same hearse; the youngest of their children was likewise at the point of death. These domestic misfortunes, joined to those abroad, and the public misery, made the end of Lewis's reign appear as a period destined for calamity; and the French now expected more missortunes than they had before seen glory and grandeur.

About this very time, the duke de Vendome died in Spain. That spirit of dejection and despondency which prevailed through all France, and which I myself remember, made every one apprehensive, that Spain, hitherto supported by Vendome, would now be lost by his death.

Landrecy could not hold out long. It was even debated in council at Verfailles, whether the king should not retire to Chambord. Upon this occasion, his majesty told marshal d'Harcourt, that, in case of any new misfortune, he would summon together all the nobility of his kingdom, and, notwithstanding he was in his seventy-fourth year, would lead them on against the enemy, and die at the head of his army.

d

7-

e

S

h,

ty

by

C-

e-

en

or

ces

ght

ch-

of of

and

ear

nly

on:

A mistake of prince Eugene delivered the king, and the whole kingdom, from their perplexities. It is said, that his lines were too much extended; that his magazine of stores was at too great a distance; and that general Albemarle, posted at Denain, betwixt Marchiennes and the prince's camp, was not properly situated to be speedily succoured, if attacked. I have been assured, that a very beautiful Italian lady, whom I saw some time after at the Hague, and who was then kept by prince Eugene, resided at the Marchiennes; and that she was the cause of the magazine being fixed at this place. It seems not to be doing justice to prince Eugene, to imagine imagine that a woman should influence his military dispositions. Those who know, that a curate. together with a counsellor of Douay, named le Fevre d'Orval, walking towards these parts, were the first who projected the attack on Denain and Marchiennes, may demonstrate, from this fact, by what fecret and weak springs the greatest affairs of this world are often directed. Le Fevre gave his opinion to the governor of the province; he communicated it to marshal Montsequiou, who commanded under Villars. The general approved of it, and put it in execution. This action proved. in effect, the fafety of France, more than the peace with England. Marshal Villars had recourse to stratagem; he ordered a body of dragoons to advance in fight of the enemy's camp, as if they were about to attack it; and, whilst these retired towards Guise, the marshal marched to Denain 2 with his army in five columns; and forced the intrenchments of general Albemarle, defended by feventeen battalions, who were all killed or taken. The general furrendered himself a prisoner, together with two princes of Nassau, a prince of Holilein, a prince of Anhalt, and all the officers. Prince Eugene hastened with what troops he could get, but did not arrive till the action was over : he went to attack a bridge leading to Denain, which the French guarded; but in this attempt he lost most of his men, and was obliged to return to his camp, after being a witness of this defeat.

All the posts towards Marchiennes, along the Scarpe, were carried one after another, with great rapidity. The French now advanced to Marchiennes, defended by four thousand men: they besieged the place with so much vigour, that, in three days, the whole garison were made pri-

to

cro

DO

car

alf

wa

nef

ack

dep

thei

foners, together with all the provisions, and war-like stores, which the enemy had amassed for the campaign. Marshal Villars had now entirely the superiority. The enemy, being disconcerted, raised the siege of Landrecy, and suffered Douay, Queinoy, and Bouchain, to be retaken; so that the frontiers were now in security. The army of prince Eugene retreated, after having lost sifty battalions; forty of which, from the battle of Denain to the end of the campaign, had at different times been taken prisoners. The most signal victory could not have produced greater advantages.

If marshal Villars had had the popularity of some other generals, he must now have been extolled as the deliverer of his country; but his services were hardly acknowledged; and, amidst the public joy for this unexpected success, envy was still predominant.

Every step of Villars hastened the peace of Ut-The ministry of queen Anne, accountable to their own country, as well as Europe, neglected neither the interest of England, nor that of their allies, nor the public fafety. They, in the first place, infifted, that Philip V. established in Spain, should renounce all his pretensions to the crown of France, which he had always maintained; and that his brother, the duke de Berri, heir apparent to the crown of France, after Lewis's only great grandfon, who was at the point ofdeath, should likewise renounce all claim to the crown of Spain, in case he became king of France. The same renunciation was also required of the duke of Orleans. But the late war, of twelve years continuance, proved the weakness of such ties upon mankind. There is as yet no law acknowledged, which can oblige the descendants to deprive themselves of the right of reigning, though their fathers may have renounced it. Such renuncia-

,

0

h

S

T

ne

at

.

y

in

i-

5,

July 30. 1712. C September, and October, 1712.

tions are of no efficacy, but when the common interest agrees with them. However, for a little, they calmed a storm which had continued for twelve years; and it was very probable, that the time would come when several nations would endeavour to maintain these renunciations, now become the basis of the balance and tranquillity of Europe.

By this treaty they gave the duke of Savoy the island of Sicily, with the title of king; and, on the continent, Fenestrelles, Exilles, with the valley of Pragilas: thus they aggrandized him at the expence of the house of Bourbon.

They assigned the Dutch a considerable barrier, which they had always desired; and as they had taken some territories from the house of Bourbon in favour of the duke of Savoy, so likewise they incroached a little on the rights of the Austrian samily, to satisfy the Dutch, who at the expence of this house, were now to become the governors and masters of the strongest towns in Flanders. The commercial interest of Holland was taken care of; and articles were likewise stipulated in favour of Portugal.

To the emperor was allotted the fovereignty of the Ten provinces in Spanish Flanders, and the important government of the barrier towns. He had likewise confirmed to him the kingdom of Naples and Sardinia, with all his possessions in Lombardy, and the four sea-ports on the coasts of Tuscany: but the council of Vienna, looking upon themselves aggrieved, would not agree to these conditions.

In regard to Great Britain, her interest and glory were intirely secured. She procured, as one article, that the harbour of Dunkirk, which had been the cause of so many jealousies, should be demolished. Spain left her in the possession of Gibraltar and Minorca.

Minorca. France gave up to her Hudson's-Bay, the island of Newfoundland, and Nova Scotia. As to her trade in America, she even obtained privileges not granted to the French, who placed Philip V. on the throne. We must likewise ascribe to the English ministry, as a most giorious article, their obliging Lewis XIV. to set at liberty those of his subjects, who had been confined for their religious principles. This was, indeed, to dictate laws; but such, however, as were perfectly equitable.

Queen Anne, at last, sacrificing the rights of blood, and her own inclinations, to the good of her country, used her interest to have the succession settled, and properly secured, upon the house of

Hanover.

n n

y

aof

nd

he

f;

of

of

the

He

of

in

of

pon

nese

lory

icle,

the

hed.

and

orca.

As to the electors of Bavaria and Cologn, the duke of Bavaria was to keep the duchy of Luxembourg, and county of Namur, till he and his brother were re-established in their electorates; for Spain had given up these two sovereignties to the Bavarian, as a recompence for his losses; and the allies had neither taken Namur nor Luxembourg.

As to France, who agreed to demolish Dunkirk, and to give up so many places in Flanders, formerly conquered by her arms, and confirmed by the treaties of Nimegen and Ryswick, she had given up to her Lise, Aire, Bethune, and Saint-Venant.

Thus it appeared, that the English ministry rendered justice to all parties; but they themselves did not meet with the like candour from the Whigs. One half of the English nation soon after insulted the memory of queen Anne, for having done one of the greatest and best actions, that can ever be in the power of a sovereign, that of restoring peace to so many nations. She was reproached, in that she might easily have dismembered France, and yet neglected the opportunity.

All

All these treaties were signed, one after another, in the year 1713. The emperor, either through the obstinacy of prince Eugene, or the bad policy of his council, entered not into any of these negociations: he might certainly have had Landau, and perhaps Strasbourg, had he at first come readily into the measures of queen Anne; but he remained obstinate for war, and had nothing.

Marshal Villars, having secured what remained of the French Flanders, marched towards the Rhine; and, after having made himself master of Spires, Worms, and all the adjacent country, took Landau, the same which the emperor might have preserved by a peace. He forced the intrenchments which prince Eugene had drawn in the Brisgaw, and defeated marshal Vaubonne within his lines. He likewise besieged and took Fribourg, the metropolis of Upper Austria.

The council of Vienna were, on all sides, extremely urgent for the succours promised by the circles of the empire. These reinforcements, however, did not arrive; and the emperor at last became sensible, that, without England and Holland, he could not oppose France; and he resolved, when

T

b

6

r

re

too late, to make peace.

Marshal Villars, having thus concluded the war, had likewise the honour of concluding another peace at Rastadt with prince Eugene. This was, perhaps, the first instance of two generals meeting, at the end of a campaign, to treat in the name of their masters. Upon this occasion, they both behaved with that easy freedom peculiar to their characters. I have heard marshal Villars say, that the following was one of his first expressions to prince Eugene:

"Sir, we are not enemies to each other; your ene"mies are at Vienna, and mine at Versailles."

Aug. 20. 1713. September 20. October 30.
Both,

Both, indeed, had always factions to flruggle against at their own courts.

e

1.

-

d,

n

r, ce

13,

he

eir

ed

rs.

ing

c:

ne-

s."

10.

oth

In this treaty no mention was made of the rights which the emperor pretended upon the monarchy of Spain, nor the empty title of Catholic king, which Charles VI. always assumed, whilst Philip V. had the kingdom. Lewis XIV. still kept Strasbourg and Landau, which he had before proposed to resign, together with Hunninguen and new Brisac, which he had offered to demolish; and he still retained the sovereignty of Alsace, which formerly he would have renounced: and, what was most honourable, he got the electors of Bavaria and Cologn re-established in their dominions and honours.

It is extremely remarkable, that France, in all her treaties with the emperors, always protected the rights of the princes and states of the empire. She laid the foundation of the Germanic liberty at Munster, and got an eighth electorate created for the house of Bavaria. The treaty of Nimegen confirmed that of Westphalia. By the treaty of Ryswick, France procured the cardinal de Furstemburg the restoration of all his possessions; and now, by the peace of Utrecht, she re-established the two electors. It must be owned, that, in all this negotiation, which terminated so long a dispute, France received the law from England, and, in her turn, gave it to the Empire.

The historical accounts of the settimes, from whence most of the histories of Lewis XIV. have been compiled, say, that prince Eugene, at the conclusion of the conferences, begged the duke de Villars, in his name, to embrace Lewis's knees, and to present that monarch with the most profound and sincere tespects "of a subject to his sovereign." But, in the first place, it cannot be said, that a prince, the grandson of a prince, is the subject of another prince because he was born in his dominions. Secondly, it is still less consistent, that prince Eugene, the generalissimo of the Empire, should call himself a subject of the French monarch.

Mean while, each power took possession of their new rights. The duke of Savoy got himself acknowleged in Sicily, without confulting the emperor, who in vain complained. Lewis fent his troops to take possession of Liste. The Dutch seized upon the barrier towns; and the states of the country gave them one million two hundred and fifty thoufand florins annually, for being mafters of Flanders. Lewis ordered the harbour of Dunkirk to be filled up, the citadel to be rased, and all the fortifications. and the mole to be destroyed, in fight of the English commiffary. The Dunkirkers, now feeing their commerce intirely ruined, fent a deputation of their number to implore the clemency of queen Anne. It was not a little mortifying to Lewis XIV. that his subjects should go to solicit the favour of a queen of England; but it was still more mortifying to them, that the queen was obliged to refuse their request.

500

fi

W

h

01

du

ra

"

W.

The king, some time after, caused the canal of Mardyke to be inlarged; and, by means of the fluices, an harbour was foon made, faid to be equal to that of Dunkirk. The earl of Stair, embaffador from England, made warm remonstrances to Lewis on that account. It is faid, in one of the best books extant, that his majefty made this reply to lord Stair: "Mr. Embassador, I have always been master in my own kingdom, and fometimes in others; do not remind me of this." I am quite certain, that Lewis never made fo unfuitable an answer. He had never been mafter of the English; but was the farthest from it that could be. He was always indeed mafter in his own dominions: but the question is, whether he was so far master, as to

to be able to elude a treaty, to which he owed his present tranquillity, and, perhaps, the greatest part of his kingdom. It is however certain that he immediately put a stop to the works at Mardyke; and thus yielded to the embassador's representations, instead of treating them with disregard. All that had been done at Mardyke, was soon after demolished, during the regency, and the treaty sulfilled in every particular.

Notwithstanding this peace of Utrecht, and that of Rastadt, Philip V. did not enjoy all the Spanish monarchy; he had still Catalonia to subdue, as well as the islands of Majorca and Ivica.

of

he

al

or

VIS

ks

ord

ter

rs;

in,

ver.

but

was

but

29

to

Here I must take notice, that the emperor Charles had left his wife at Barcelona; not being able to fupport the war in Spain, nor willing to give up his rights, and accept of the peace of Utrecht, had agreed with queen Anne, that the emperor, and his troops, being of no more service in Catalonia, should be embarked in English vessels. Catalonia was accordingly evacuated; and Staremberg, at his departure, refigned the title of viceroy. But he left all the feeds of a civil war; and the hopes of a speedy relief from the emperor, and even from England. Those who had then the greatest influence in that province, imagined they might now form a republic under a foreign protection; and that the Spanish monarch would not be able to reduce them. They now displayed the same character which Tacitus ascribed to them so long ago: " An intrepid people," fays that historian, " who " who look upon life as nothing, when not em-" ployed in fighting."

Had they exerted themselves as much for Philip V. their king as they did against him, the archduke would never have contended for Spain. They shewed plaints, by heir obstituate resistance, that Philip V. though assengaged of his competitor,

could

could not alone reduce them. Lewis XIV. who, towards the close of the war, could neither furnish his grandson with ships nor soldiers against Charles, now supplied him with both to quell his revolted subjects. The port of Barcelona was blocked up with a French sleet, and marshal Berwick besieged it by land.

The queen of Great Britain, faithful to her treaties, did not succour this town. The emperor promised, but sent no succour: the besieged desended themselves with a courage supported by a kind of fanatical madness. The priests and monks ran to arms, and mounted the breaches, as if they sought for religion. The phantom of liberty rendered them deaf to all the offers made by their master. More than five hundred ecclesiastics lost their lives in arms at this siege; and we may easily judge from thence, whether their discourse and example had not greatly animated the people.

They hung out a black flag from the breach, and bore feveral affaults in a furprifing manner. The affailants having at last forced their way, the befleged fought from street to street: when the old town was taken, they retired to the new; and, in capitulating, they still demanded the preservation of their rights . However, they only obtained their lives and properties; for most of their privileges were taken away. Sixty monks were condemned to the galleys; and this was the only vengeance taken. Philip V. had treated the little town of Xativa more severely in the course of this war: he had rased it to the very foundation, as an example to deter others. But though an inconfiderable place might be thus destroyed, it would have been extremely unpolitic to demolish a large town, with so fine a port, and so beneficial to the whole kingdom.

the

and

in t

Cha

driv

fink,

The

of A

narch

Lom

a fma

Vo

September 12. 1714.

n ot

ıd

he

cold

in

on

ned

vi-

on-

en-

wn ar:

ple

lace

ex-

h fo

om.

This

This fury of the Catalans, which had not inspired them when Charles VI. was amongst them, but transported them to such a degree, when destitute of assistance, was the last slame of that fire which had laid waste the most beautiful part of Europe, for so considerable a time, occasioned by the will of Charles II. king of Spain.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The state of Europe, from the peace of Utrecht to the year 1750.

I Shall still continue to call this a civil war. The duke of Savoy was in arms against his two daughters. The prince de Vaudemont, who espoused the cause of the archduke Charles, had like to have taken prisoner his own father in Lombardy, who was in the interest of Philip V. Spain had been divided into sactions; and whole regiments of French Calvinists had served against their native country. It was, in short for a succession amongst relations, that a general war had been commenced; and it must likewise be observed, that queen Anne excluded from the throne her own brother, whom Lewis protected, and whom she was obliged to proscribe.

Human prudence and expectations were defeated in this war, as they generally are in every thing. Charles VI. tho' twice proclaimed at Madrid, was driven out of Spain. Lewis XIV. when ready to fink, recovered by the unexpected broils in England. The council of Spain, who had called the duke of Anjou to the throne, only to prevent their monarchy from being diffmembered, faw it still divided. Lombardy, and part of Flanders, remained to the house of Austria: the house of Prussia had likewise a small part of Flanders: the Dutch had the sovereignty reignty of another; and a fourth part was left in possession of the French. Thus the inheritance of the house of Burgundy was divided amongst four powers; and the house, which seemed to have most right, did not preserve one acre in the Spanish dominions. Sardinia, tho' of little importance to the emperor, remained to him for some time. He also for some time possessed Naples, that grand sief of Rome, which is so often, and so easily seized. The duke of Savoy had Sicily for sour years, keeping it chiefly to maintain against the pope an extraordinary, but antient right, of being pope himself in this island; that is, of being, except in particular tenets, absolute sovereign in matters of religion.

The weakness of human policy appeared still more after the peace of Utrecht, than during the war. It is certain, that the new ministry of queen Anne had fecretly formed a scheme for establishing the son of Tames II. on the throne. Queen Anne herself, influenced by her ministers, began to listen to the voice of nature, and entered into the defign of fettling the fuccession on her brother, whom she had proscribed against her inclination. Her death, however, prevented this project being put in execution. The family of Hanover, whom the looked upon as aliens, and disliked, succeeded. Her ministers were perfecuted; and the pretender's party, having made an attempt for him in 1715. were defeated. This rebellion, which, if the queen had lived a little longer, would have been termed a legal revolution, was punished by the blood of some of the chiefs concerned in it.

The good understanding, and union, betwixt France and Spain, which had raised such apprehensions, and given the alarm to so many nations, was broken off as soon as Lewis XIV. died. The duke of Orleans, regent of France, tho' irreproachable as to his guardianship of the young prince, behaved

n

C

as if he himself had been to succeed. He formed a strict alliance with England, tho' reputed the natural enemy of France, and made an open rupture with that branch of the Bourbon samily which reigned at Madrid. Philip V. who had renounced all pretensions to the crown of France by the late peace, raised, or rather gave the authority of his name to raise, seditions in France, which ought to have chosen him regent, as he could not reign in that kingdom. Thus, after the death of Lewis XIV. all the views, negotiations, and political measures, took a quite different turn in his family, as well as amongst most of the princes in Europe.

The regent of France, in concert with the English, attacked Spain; so that the first war of Lewis XV. was undertaken against his uncle, whom Lewis XIV. had settled on his throne, at the expence of so much blood.

in

of

ur

flo

0-

the

llo

of

ed.

ep-

ex-

felf

ular

. It

had

n of

in-

oice

the the

ribed

pre-

ie fa-

liens,

perfe-

de an

is re-

nger,

as pu-

etwixt

rehen-

e duke

During the course of this short war, the Spanish ministry designed to take advantage of the duke of Savoy; who had likewise formed a scheme of doing somewhat of the same nature with regard to the emperor. The result of this chaos of intrigues was, that the Spaniards deprived the emperor of Sardinia, and the duke of Savoy of Sicily, in 1718. but France having deseated them by land, and the English by sea, they were forced to give up Sicily to the house of Austria; and Sardinia was assigned to the dukes of Savoy, who still possess it, and bear the title of kings of that island.

To shew by what a blind fatality the affairs of this world are often governed, we may observe, that the Ottoman empire, which might have attacked Germany during the course of the long war in 1701. deferred it till the conclusion of thegeneral peace, and then declared war against the emperor, who had an army of veteran troops, com-

02

manded

chable ehaved manded by prince Eugene; who conquered the Turks in two memorable battles, and forced them to accept of a dishonourable peace: and, as a farther addition to these contradictions, in which all affairs abound, this very emperor, victorious over the Turks, could not procure Sicily, without the assistance of the English, and the regent of France.

But what most astonished all the courts of Europe, was to fee, some time after, in 1724. and 1725. Philip V. and Charles VI. formerly fo incenfed against each other, now so closely united; and affairs fo turned from their natural course, that the Spanish ministry, for a whole year, intirely governed the court of Vienna. This court, which hitherto always exerted herfelf to hinder the Spanish branch of the French family from all access in Italy, so far quitted her natural sentiments, as to admit a son of Philip, and Elizabeth of Parma, his fecond wife, into Italy; from which it was defigned to exclude both French and Spaniards. The emperor gave up to this younger fon of his competitor, the poffession of Parma, Placentia, and the grand duchy of Tuscany: and tho' the succession of these dominions was not open, Don Carlos was admitted there, with fix thousand Spaniards; and the expence of Spain was only two hundred thousand pistoles, given to the court of Vienna.

This error of the emperor's council was far from being a lucky one; for it cost him dear in the confequences. The whole of this affair was unnatural: two families formed an union, without having any confidence in each other. The English, who had done all in their power to dethrone Philip V. and had taken from him Minorca and Gibraltar, were the mediators in this treaty; and it was signed by Ripperda, a Dutchman, who was become a duke, and a man of great power in Spain: he was soon

after

f

fe

after disgraced, and went to end his days in Morocco, where he endeavoured to establish a new religion.

d

f-

ne

eá

to

ch

ar

of

fe,

ide

ve

of-

hy

ni-

ted

nce

les,

om

on-

ral:

any

had

and

were

d by

uke,

foon

after

Mean while, in France, the regency of the duke of Orleans, which seemed likely to be so full of troubles, by means of his fecret enemies, and the almost total ruin of the finances, proved the most quiet and fortunate. The French had been inured to perfect submission under Lewis XIV. And hence arofe the fafety of the regent, and the publick tranquillity. A conspiracy, directed at a distance by cardinal Alberoni, and but ill conducted in France, was discovered, and crushed in embryo. The parliament, which, during the administration of the late queen regent, had raised a civil war, and had annulled the wills of Lewis XIII. and XIV. with less ceremony than that of a private person, was scarce at liberty to make remonstrances, when the value of their specie was increased to three times more than the usual standard; and their procession afoot from the grand chamber to the Louvre served only to draw upon them the railleries of the people. The most unjust edict that had been ever issued, the prohibiting the whole inhabitants of a kingdom to keep by them above five hundred livres in current coin, raised not the least commotion. A general want of specie, the people flocking in crouds to the bank, to receive a little money for the necessary expences of life, in exchange for a discredited paper, which overspread the whole kingdom; several perfons squeezed to death in the croud, and their bodies earried by the people to the royal palace; all these things produced no appearance of a fedition. In short, this famous project of Law's, which had feemed to threaten the regency and the kingdom with destruction, contributed, in reality, to the support of both, by consequences which none had forefeen. Q 3

The

The passion for riches, which now seized all ranks of people, from the lowest class to the magistrates. bishops, and even princes of the blood, turned the minds of every one from all attention to the public interest, and all political or ambitious views; for the thoughts of every one were now wholly engroffed with the fear of losing, and the desire of gaining. It was indeed, a new and furprifing game, wherein the whole nation betted against each other; and, having the true spirit of eager gamesters, they did not choose to quit their play, to meddle with the government. It happened, however, which could not be foreseen but by persons of the greatest experience and penetration, that a chimerical project produced a real commerce, and restored the India company, which had been established by the famous Colbert, but ruined by the late wars. short, though the fortune of many private persons was ruined, yet the nation, in a little time, became richer, and more flourishing in commerce. This project sharpened the understanding of the people, as civil wars generally excite their courage.

The distraction in the finances having ceased with the regency, that in politics also subsided as soon as cardinal Fleury came to the head of the ministry. If there ever was an happy mortal upon earth, the cardinal was surely so. He was looked upon as a most amiable man, and perfectly agreeable in conversation, even to his seventy-third year: and at this age, when others retire from the world, he took upon him the helm of government, and was always considered as a person of the highest wisdom. All his measures, from 1726 to 1742. proved successful; and he preserved his intellectual faculties found, clear, and capable of transacting affairs, even to the ninetieth year of his age.

When we consider, that, of a thousand of our cotemporaries, there is very rarely one who arrives at this age, we must allow, that Fleury had a peculiar destiny. If his grandeur was extraordinary, which, having begun so late, shone such a considerable time, without any cloud to obscure it, his moderation, and sweetness of manners, were no less conspicuous. The riches and magnificence of cardinal d'Amboise, who aspired at the papacy, are well known; as well as the arrogant simplicity of Ximenes, who raised armies at his own expence, and who, in the dress of a monk, said, that he led the nobles of Spain with his cord. Every one is likewise acquainted with the regal pomp of Richelieu, and the immense riches amassed by Mazarin. The characteristic of cardinal Fleury was moderation. He was simple, and frugal, in every particular, and always uniform in his behaviour: he had nothing high nor elevated in his character; which was owing to his mildness, equanimity, and love of order and peace. He proved, that persons of a mild, condescending, and benevolent temper, are best formed to govern others.

He let the kingdom quietly repair its losses, and grow rich by an extensive commerce, without making any innovation: thus treating the state as a strong and robust constitution, which naturally recovers of itself.

e

d

n

d

)-

ot

i-

).

ia

a-

In

ns

ne

nis

le,

ed

23

he

on

ed

ee-

ar:

ld,

ind

est

42.

ual

af-

nen

Political affairs insensibly returned into their natural channel. Happily for Europe, Sir Robert Walpole, the prime minister of England, was of a disposition equally pacific. These two men maintained almost all Europe in that tranquillity which lasted from the peace of Utrecht to the year 1733. and which was but once interrupted by the short war in 1718. This was an happy time for all nations, who, cultivating commerce and arts with emulation, forgot their past calamities.

Q 4

In

In these times two powers arose, which had been hardly mentioned in Europe before this age. The one was Russia, which the czar Peter the Great had raised out of a state of barbarity. This monarchy, before his time, consisted only in vast deserts, and a people without laws, without discipline, and without any useful knowledge; such as the Tartars have always been. This country was so little known in France, that when Lewis, in 1668. received an embassador from Muscovy, a medal was struck on the occasion, as had been done in memory of the Siamese embassy. This new empire, after having deseated Sweden, began to have an influence in all affairs, and to give laws in the North.

The second power, established by force of art, and upon less extensive foundations, was Prussia. It was as yet, however, only in its infancy, and had not distinguished itself.

The house of Austria remained almost in the same state in which she had been placed by the peace of Utrecht. England still preserved her power by sea, whilst that of Holland gradually decayed. This little commonwealth, become powerful through the indolence of other nations, began to decline, because her neighbours now carried on trade, which the Dutch before had wholly to themselves. Sweden languished, whilst Denmark sourished. Spain and Portugal were chiefly supported by America. Italy, which was always in a weak condition, remained divided into as many states as at the beginning of the age, excepting Mantua, annexed to the Austrian samily.

Savoy at this time surprised the world with an extraordinary occurrence, which may serve as a grand lesson to sovereigns. The king of Sardinia, duke of Savoy, that Victor Amedeus, who had been sometimes an enemy, and sometimes an ally, to France and Austria, and whose inconstancy had

paffed

a

it

n

•

e

ſe

d

s,

t,

a.

ıd

ıe

e

oy

is

he

e.

ch

en

nd

ly,

ed

of

u-

an

2

12,

ad y,

ad ed

passed for policy, being at last tired of business, and of himself, in the year 1730. and the fixty-fourth year of his age, through caprice, refigned the crown he had borne the first of his family; and, a year after, in another fit of caprice, repented of this step. Neither the company of his mistress, who was become his wife, devotion, nor tranquillity, were sufficient employment to a soul like his, which, for fifty years, had been busied in the affairs of Europe. He gave a remarkable instance of human frailty, and shewed how liable the mind is to be diffatisfied, either in a private station, or on In this age four fovereigns renounced their crowns: Christina, Casimir, Philip V. and Philip refumed his against his Victor Amedeus. inclination; Casimir never once thought of it; Christina had once thoughts of it, upon a difgust the received at Rome; Amedeus was the only one who endeavoured by force to re-afcend the throne, which he had quitted through an uneafi-The consequence of this attempt ness of mind. His fon, Charles-Emanuel, might is well known. have acquired a glory superior to the possession of any crown, in reftoring his father what he held from him, bad his father alone, or the circumstances of time, exacted this compliance ; but an ambitious mistress wanted to reign: and all the council were under a necessity to prevent this, and even to confine their late sovereign. He died foon after in prison. It has been said, though falsely, in the memoirs of these times, that the court of France intended to fend twenty thousand men to affift the father against his fon; but neither the abdication of that prince, nor his effort to regain the crown, nor his confinement, nor death, caused the least motion amongst any of the neighbouring nations.

Q 5

All

All remained peaceable from Ruffia even to Spain, till the death of Augustus II. plunged Europe again into fresh troubles and commotions, from which the

is fo feldom exempted.

King Sanislaus, father in-law to Lewis XV. having been already nominated to the succession of Poland, in 1704. was elected king in 1733. in the most folemn and legal manner. But the emperor Charles VI. procured another election, which was supported by his own arms, and those of Russia; and a fon of the late king of Poland, elector of Saxony, who had married a niece of Charles VI. carried it against his competitor. Thus the house of Austria, which had not been able to preserve Spain and the West-Indies, and which could not even settle a trading company at Oftend, yet had fufficient interest to deprive the father-in-law of Lewis XV. of the crown. France beheld a fecond example of what had formerly happened to prince Armand de Conti; who, having been folemnly elected, but having neither money nor troops, and being rather recommended than supported, lost the crown to which he had been elected.

King Stanislaus went to Dantzick, to support his election: but the great majority in his favour foon yielded to the small party against him. This country, where the people are flaves, where the nobility fell their votes, where they never have a fufficient treasury to maintain an army, where the laws are without force, and where liberty is only productive of divisions; this country, I say, boasted in vain of its warlike nobility, who could bring into the field an army of an hundred thousand men on horseback. Ten thousand Russians at once put to slight all who were assembled in favour of Stanislaus. nation, who, the preceding age, looked upon the Ruffians with the utmost contempt, now dreaded them, them, and followed the measures they dictated. The empire of Russia had become formidable ever since the time of Peter the Great. Ten thousand disciplined Russian slaves dispersed the whole nobility and gentry of Poland; and king Stanislaus, having taken shelter in Dantzick, was besieged there by an army of thirty thousand men.

e

e

ot

ad

of

e-

to o-

or

p-

en

his

no

ın-

lity

ent

are

tive

n of

field

ack.

who olish

the

nem,

The emperor of Germany, being in union with Ruffia, was almost fure of fuccess. In order to keep an equal balance, France ought to have fent a numerous army by fea; but England, as foon as fhe had feen fuch vaft preparations, would have declared herself. Cardinal Fleury, who took particular care to keep England quiet, was neither willing to fuffer the shame of deserting Stanislaus, nor did he choose to venture too great a force to succour him. He fent a fleet with fifteen hundred men, under the command of a brigadier. The officer imagined, that nothing was in earnest designed; and when he approached Dantzick, thinking he should facrifice his men to no manner of purpose, he went to amuse himself in Denmark. The count de Plelo. embassador from France at the Danish court, was highly enraged at this retreat, and looked upon it as He was a youth, who, having studied polite learning and philosophy, had imbibed the most heroic fentiments, and fuch as merited a better fate than he met with. He refolved to fuccour Dantzick against so numerous an army with this small force, or to die in the attempt. Before his embarkation, he wrote a letter to one of the fecretaries of flate, which ended in these words: "I am certain " I shall not return: I therefore recommend my " wife and children to your care." He arrived in the road of Dantzick, and, having difembarked, attacked the Ruffian army; and after having received many wounds, he perished, as he had forefeen;

feen; and all his party were either killed or taken prisoners. His letter, and the news of his death. arrived at the same time. Dantzick was taken, and the French embaffador in Poland, who happened to be in this place, was made a prisoner of war. in violation of the privileges due to his character. Stanislaus was obliged to disguise himself, and at last escaped, after having run through many dangers. and feen a price fet upon his head by the Muscovite general, in a free country, the place of his nativity, and amidst a nation who had elected him king, with all the formality of their laws. The French ministry would have intirely lost that reputation necessary for the support of its grandeur, if it had not revenged fuch an infult; but a revenge, unless attended with some utility, would but little avail.

The great distance of Russia hindered them from carrying their refentment against the Muscovites; and policy directed their vengeance upon the emperor. This they accordingly put in execution in Germany, and in Italy. France formed a league with Spain and Sardinia; and though these three powers had each separate interests, yet they all aimed at humbling Austria.

The duke of Savoy, for a confiderable time, had been gradually increasing their dominions, by sometimes felling their affistance to the emperors, and fometimes by declaring against them. King Charles-Emanuel had great hopes of getting the Milanese, and was promised it by the French and Spanish ministries. Philip V. king of Spain, or rather queen Elizabeth of Parma, his confort, expected greater possessions than Parma and Placentia to be settled on her children. France proposed no other advantage but her own glory, the welfare of her allies, and the humbling of her enemies. Nobody Nobody then expected, that Lorrain should be the fruits of this war. Mankind are generally guided by events, which they seldom are able to govern. No negociation was ever more speedily terminated than that which united these three monarchs.

England and Holland, who had been fo long accustomed to join Austria against France, abandoned her at this juncture. This was the effect of that reputation for equity and moderation, which the French court had lately acquired. The notion of her being pacifically inclined, and void of all ambition, kept her natural enemies quiet even when the declared war; and nothing furely can redound more to the honour of the ministry, than their having persuaded such powers, that France might carry on a war against the emperor, without giving any alarm to the liberty of Europe: all these powers accordingly beheld the rapid fuccess of the French arms, easy and undisturbed. A French army had gotten poffession of the country upon the Rhine; and another party of their troops, in conjunction with those of Spain and Savoy, had rendered themselves masters of Italy. Marshal Villars finished his glorious career, in the eighty-second year of his age, after having taken Milan. Marshal de Cogni, his successor, gained two battles; whilst the duke de Montemar, the Spanish general, obtained a victory in the kingdom of Naples, at Bitonto, from whence he was furnamed; this being an honour which the Spaniards often bestow, in imitation of the antient Romans. Don Carlos, who had been acknowledged hereditary fuccessor of Tuscany, was now declared king of Naples and Sicily. Thus the emperor Charles VI. loft almost all Italy, for having given a king to Poland: and, in two campaigns, a fon of the Spanish monarch, got both the Sicilies, so often taken and retaken formerly, and upon which, for OWI two ages, the house of Austria had continually fixed her attention.

This was the only war in Italy which ended with any folid advantage to the French, fince the time of Charlemagne. The reason of this was, their having the guardian of the Alps on their side, who was become one of the most potent princes in those parts; their being likewise seconded by the best troops of Spain; and their armies being constantly supplied with all necessaries.

The emperor then thought himself very happy in receiving conditions of peace offered by the victorious French. However, Cardinal Fleury, who had the sagacity to prevent England and Holland from intermeddling in this war, shewed likewise his great address in finishing it, without their mediation.

By this treaty, Don Carlos was acknowleded king of Naples and Sicily. Europe had already been often accustomed to such alterations. They assigned to Francis duke of Lorrain, destined to be fon-in-law to the emperor, the inheritance of the Medicis family, which had been before granted to Don Carlos; and this made the late grand duke of Tuscany, upon his death-bed, ask, " If they " would not name a third heir, and which of their " children the Empire and France would appoint " for his successor." We must not imagine from this, that the dukedom of Tuscany considers itself as a fief of the Empire; but the emperor esteemed it as fuch, as well as Parma and Placentia, which have been always claimed by the holy fee; and for which the late duke of Parma did actually pay homage to the pope : fo much do the rights of princes alter with the circumstances of time. this peace these duchies of Parma and Placentia, which, by right of blood, belonged to Don Carlos, son of Philip V. and a princess of Parma, were given up to the emperor Charles VI. as his property.

,

r

t

n

f

d

h

d

y

f

y

1,

r-

s,

The duke of Savoy, now king of Sardinia, who expected the duchy of Milan, which his family, for a confiderable time, had claimed as their right, got only a small part thereof; viz. the Novarese, Tortonese, and the fiefs of the Langhes. He derived his pretentions to Milan from a daughter of Philip II. king of Spain, from whom he was descended. France likewise pretended thereto, by right of Lewis XII. the natural heir of this duchy. Philip V. urged also his right to Milan, as it had been feudatory successively to four kings of Spain, his predecessors. But all these pretensions yielded to convenience, and the public interest. The emperor kept the Milanese, notwithstanding the general law of the states of the empire, which fays, that the emperor shall keep the fovereignty, but give the possession to some other power. It was intended as a limitation on the emperors, who might otherwise in time swallow up the whole dominions of the Empire. But there are so many exceptions to this law, and there are so many examples for and against it, that, in any grand affair of state, it must be confessed, that the present interest is the ruling law.

By this treaty, king Stanislaus renounced a kingdom, which though it had been twice given to him, he could never get possession of; but he kept the title of king. For this loss he was now to have a recompence; but it proved more so to France than him. Cardinal Fleury was contented at first with Barrois, which the duke of Lorrain was to give up to Stanislaus, with the reversion to the crown of France. Lorrain was not to be given up till its duke should be in possession of Tuscany: so that the cession depended upon many chances. This was reaping very little from such great success, and so many favourable circumstances; of which the cardinal being urged to make more advantages, demanded Lorrain on the same conditions as Barrois; and it was accordingly granted.

It cost France only a small sum of money, and a pension of four million and five hundred thousand livres, to the duke, till Tuscany fell to him.

Thus Lorrain became for ever annexed to the crown of France; a reunion which had been so often unsuccessfully attempted. By this means, a Polish king was transplanted to Lorrain; which was the last time this province had a sovereign to reside there; and he rendered it happy. The reigning house of the princes of Lorrain got the sovereignty of Tuscany. The second son of the king of Spain was transferred to Naples: so that the medal of Trajan might have been renewed; regna

H

N

n

g

qu

fo

lan

an. Sa

affignata, " kingdoms affigned."

The house of Bourbon, at the end of this short war, was advanced to such a pitch of grandeur as she could not have expected even in the height of Lewis XIV's prosperity. Almost all the inheritance of Charles V. Spain, the two Sicilies, Mexico, and Peru, were now in her possession. house of Austria at last ended in the person of Charles VI. in 1740. What remained of his dominions was likely to be taken from his daughter, and divided amongst several power. France carried the election of an emperor with the same facility as the emperors had formerly chosen the electors of Co. logn, and the bishops of Liege. The famous pragmatic fanction of the late Austrian emperor, who had thereby fettled his whole dominions on his daughter; this fanction, guaranteed by the Empire, England, Holland, and France herself, was at first supported by no one power. The elector of Bavaria, son of him who had been put under the ban

,

a

d

ò

h

0

1-

eng

e-

10 rt

as of

ri-

xi-

he

of

nind

he

he

0-ous

or,

on

m.

vas

the

oan

ban of the Empire, was crowned, without opposition, duke of Austria at Lintz, king of Bohemia at Prague, and emperor at Frankfort, by the arms of Lewis XV. They went even to the gates of Vi-The daughter of fo many emperors found herself, for a whole year, intirely destitute of assistance, and without any hope but what arose from her own intrepidity. Scarce were her father's eyes closed, when she lost Silesia by an invasion of the young king of Prussia, who will be long talked of by posterity. He was the first who took advantage of this conjuncture, to promote his grandeur. For this purpose, he made use of an army as well disciplined as that of the antient Romans, which his father seemed to have formed only for parade and empty shew. France, Prussia, Saxony, and Bavaria, attacked the remains of the house of Austria. Her allies beheld this in silence; and the division of her dominions seemed now unavaoidable. But it foon appeared evident, how difficult it is for fuch a weak prince as the elector of Bavaria, emperor under the name of Charles VII. but without power, and a general without national troops, to conquera kingdom by the power of another. Never were fuch great advantages succeeded by so many misfortunes. What seemed likely to promote his grandeur, contributed to his ruin; and that extremity to which the queen of Hungary was reduced, served to raise her still higher. The house of Austria sprung up again out of her ashes. The queen of Hungary found a powerful ally in George II. king of Great Britain. Her cause was likewise foon after espoused by the king of Sardinia, Holland, and even by Russia, who sent the last year of the war thirty-five thousand men to her affistance. She made separate treaties with Prussia and Saxony: but, above all, her own intrepid spirit supported supported her as much as any of her allies. Hungary, where her ancestors had experienced a continued scene of civil wars, rebellions, and executions, proved to her a kingdom united, affectionate. and filled with zealous friends. The war was carried on in the heart of Germany, in Italy, Flanders, and even upon the frontiers of France, and on the Indian and American feas, almost in the same manner as that in 1701. Cardinal Fleu. ry, now too far advanced in years to support so heavy a burden, lavished away, with regret, the treasures of France in this war, entered into against his inclination, and died, after having been a spectator of nothing but misfortunes arising from miscon. duct. The French ministry had neglected to improve the marine, thinking it useless: what remained of their navy had been intirely destroyed by the English, and the provinces of France lay altogether exposed. The emperor, whom France had made, was thrice driven from his own dominions, and died one of the most unfortunate princes upon earth, in having been exalted to the highest pitch of human grandeur. The queen of Hungary tasted at once the pleasure and glory of creating her husband emperor, and of restoring the imperial dignity to her family.

Lewis XV. after the death of cardinal Fleury in 1743. whom he greatly lamented, took the government intirely upon himself; and repaired the misfortunes which arose in the last years of Fleury's ministry. He was successful every-where, except in Italy, where he had to oppose the king of Sardinia, whom the cardinal had alienated from France.

There was one remarkable thing in this war; which was, that there had never been feen fo many fovereigns at the head of their armies. Francis of Lorrain, grand duke of Tuscany, afterwards emperor, often headed the Austrian troops. Don Carlos, king of Naples, Naples, fon of Philip V. commanded his army at Veletri: and the king of Great Britain in person gained a battle near the Maine.

1-

u-

e,

as

y,

e, in

u. fo

the

inst

taon-

im.

ned

the

her

ade,

rth,

man

em-

her

y in

mif-

ury's

pt in

linia,

war;

many Lor-

peror,

ingot aples,

The king of Sardinia appeared every-where with his troops, and always with success. The king of Prussia himself obtained five victories. Lewis XV. procured glory and superiority to his nation at the battle of Fontenoy, and preserved them in that at Laufeld. In short, after having in person subdued all Flanders, and taken Maestricht, by marshal Saxe; after his enemies were driven out of Provence by marshal Bellisle; after having saved Genoa by marshal Richlieu; after having settled the king of Naples on his throne; he made a peace as glorious as any of his campaigns: for at the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, he shewed a most unparalleled and unexpected moderation, not even referving any thing to himself of what he had conquered by his arms. He had, however, the glory of protecting his allies: of restoring the Gencele to their rights; of establishing the duke of Modena in his dominions, and of fettling the infant Don Philip in Parma and Placentia, the inheritance of his mother. This was, indeed, a great acquisition, thus to be the protector of all his allies. Reputation, amongst powerful princes, is equal to conquests. After such an happy peace, France was re-established on the same floring as at the peace of Utrecht, and became still more flourishing.

The Christian powers in Europe were now divided into two grand parties, who became a check upon each other, and who both endeavoured to maintain that balance, the pretext of so many wars, and which was esteemed the true basis of a lasting peace. The empress queen of Hungary, part of Germany, Russia, Great Britain, Holland, and Sardinia, composed the one; France, Spain, the two Sicilies, Prussia, and Sweden, formed the other. All these powers kept up standing armies, and a lasting peace was now hoped for, from that dread which one half of Europe seemed to have of the other.

thefe

Lewis XIV. was the first who maintained such numerous armies; and this obliged the other princes to do the same for their own safety; so that, after the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, there were then in Christendom about a million of men in arms: and it is to be hoped, as all the powers have armed to defend themselves, that it will be long before any one dare to be the aggressor.

13 JY 63

END of VOL. I.